The Mortgage.

He bought in 1665 a farm of stumps and stones,
His name was God-Be Glorified his surname it was Jones,
He put a mortgage on the farm, and then in conscious pride.
"In twenty years I'll pay it up," said God-Be Glorified.

The mortgage had a hungry maw that swallowed corn and wheat;
He toiled with patience night and day to let the monster eat;
He slowly worked himself to death, and on the calm hillside
They laid beyond the monster's reach, good God-Be Glorified.

And the farm with its encumbrances of mortgage, stumps, and stones,
It fell to young Melchizedek Paul Adoniram Jones;
Melchizedek was a likely youth, a holy godly man,
And he vowed to raise that mortgage like a noble Puritan.

And he went forth every morning to the rugged mountain side.
And he dug, as dug before him poor old God-Be Glorified:
He raised pumpkins and potatoes down the monster's throat to pour;
He gulped them down and smacked his jaws, and calmly asked for more.

He worked until his back was bent, until his hair was gray;
On the hillside through a snowdrift they dug his grave one day!
His first-born son, Eliphalet, had no time to weep and brood,
For the monster by his doorstep growled forever for his food.

He fed him on his garden truck, he stuffed his ribs with hay.
And he fed him eggs and butter, but he would not go away;
And Eliphalet he staggered with the burden, and then died.
And slept with old Melchizedek and God-Be Glorified.

Then the farm it fell to Thomas, and from Thomas fell to John
Then from John to Eleazur, but the mortgage still lived on;
Then it fell to Ralph and Peter, Eli, Abselom and Paul:
Down through all the generations, but the mortgage killed them all!

About a score of years ago the farm came down to Jim,
And Jim called in the mortgage and gave the farm to him.
There's no human heart so empty that it has no ray of hope.
So Jim gave up the ancient farm and went to making soap.

He grew a fifty-millionaire, of bloated, pampered nature,
He owned ten railroads, twenty mines, and the whole State Legislature;
And thousands did his gruff commands, and lived upon his bounty;
And he came home, bought back the farm, and the entire county.

—S. W. Foss, in Yankee Blade.

A Cardinal Sin.

UNDERPLAY AND MYSTERY.

Mr. Bourchier had borne himself bravely, but strange to say, his mental ejaculation, as he resumed his review, was the same as that of the young man he had dismissed so unceremoniously. "What does he know?" was the first unuttered thought of each. Mr. Bourchier wondered what the pretender knew concerning John Boucher's death—how he knew it at all; and George Manders wondered what Mr. Bourchier knew about the dead man's family affairs. Had he said that he was aware that John Boucher's son had died in infancy, as far as his own pretended interests were concerned, Manders would have thrown up the game. If Manders had shown any definite knowledge as to the fate of his asserted father, Mr. Bourchier might not have been so bold in his defiance or so contemptuous in his dismissal. The first encounter between the two men left in the mind of each an impression of a certain amount of distrust as to his resources, but the victory was undoubtedly with Mr. Bourchier.

The little battle did him good. He felt more himself after it than he had felt for many days. He had no fear as to the self-christened Digby troubling him by aid of the law. The man was an impostor—John Boucher's words, that he had no son, being too plain to be mistaken. All he wished was that he had questioned the fellow as to the particulars of John Boucher's death, and learned whether his identity with the man he had shot was known to his visitor.

Digby Bourchier, or, more properly, George Manders, was duly shown out of the lodge-gate. He gave a lingering glance, as he departed, at Redhills and the glories thereof; then, when alone, he gritted his teeth and swore pleasantly to himself. His first essay in villainly had been much like a failure, almost bad enough to make a novice believe that after all honesty is the best policy. However, he was not so utterly cast down as to adopt that theory yet; he had other cards to play. There was the knowledge of how his pretended father died—a strong trump. If that failed to score, there was Frances in the background; she was evidently ignorant of what she was entitled to. He could either enlighten her or, for the sake of a subsidy from Mr. Bourchier, keep her in the dark. The thing was to serve George Manders first.

He walked on and on, considering how to act. Having left his portmanteau at Brackley, he took that road. He had walked to Redton in the morning, and felt quite equal to walking back again. The pull up Steepsides, from the Redton face, is a hard one, and having reached the highest point of the road he sat down to rest before commencing the descent. As he staid at Brackley to-night, he was indifferent as to time. The sun was bright and high, so, with the carelessness of youth, he sat down on the damp bank, and, leaning back, pulled his hat over his eyes. By-and-by the gentle rustle of branches, the twittering birds, and his own varied thoughts seemed to get mixed; and he dozed off on the roadside. He may have slept twenty minutes, when a gentle touch on his waistcoat fob awoke him. He sprang up, and as he did so one end of his watch-chain fell loose, and a few yards away he saw a man running from him at full speed. Mr. Manders being young and unphilosophical, obeyed the natural impulse of giving chase. Fast as the would-be pilferer fled, his pursuer's long legs gained on him; so much so, that casting a hasty glance behind him, and seeing the uselessness of a straightforward flight, he sprang suddenly into the underwood, hoping in its intricacies to baffle pursuit. Justly indignant at the attempted crime, Manders heedless of his attire, followed him. Whether he would have overtaken him is a matter of doubt, but, unfortunately for the fugitive, his foot caught in some obstacle, and he fell forward on his face. Before he could rise Manders was on him, and delighted to find some object on which he could wreck vengeance, pummelled him to his heart's content. The fallen man took his punishment silently, covering the back of his neck with his hands, but not otherwise objecting. His assailant, who was out of breath, and found the man was very hard hitting, paused in his exercise.

"Now, get up," he said, giving his victim a final kick—"get up and let me look at you."

The man, a stoutly-built rascal in a fur cap, got up into a sitting posture. "I say," he said, "don't let's have no more of this. What's beating I for, I want to know!"

Manders laughed at his question. "You impudent blackguard! after just trying to rob me. Get up; I'll take you to the nearest magistrate."

"Rob you!" said the culprit; "so you say, if you like, but you can't prove it. My words as good as yourn. I knows the law; you can't convict me on your own evidence—not you."

"Get up," said Manders, amused; "get up; I'll try, at any rate."

"You see," said the man, "you cant; you'll have a lot of trouble for nothing. I shall have something to say about 'sault and battery, too."

"Come along," said Manders, to amuse himself, although he had no intention of trying to punish the man further. "We'll see what my friend Mr. Bourchier says to-morrow."

He used Mr. Bourchier's name, for he had learned he was a terror to evil-doers in that district.

The fellow pricked up his ears at the name. "Be he a friend of yourn?" he asked.

Manders nodded.

"Well, Mr. Bourchier, he wouldn't commit me, not he."

"Why not, you rascal?"

"He won't, not he. I shall speak to him in private, and he'll let me go soon enough."

Mander's perception was very quick; there was something in the man's manner that made his heart beat.

Cough-Cures
Are abundant; but the one best known for its extraordinary anodyne and expectorant qualities is Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. For nearly half a century this preparation has been in greater demand than any other remedy for colds, coughs, bronchitis, and pulmonary complaints in general.
"I suffered for more than eight months from a severe cough accompanied with hemorrhage of the lungs and the expectoration of matter. The physicians gave me up, but my druggist prevailed on me to try
Ayer's Cherry Pectoral.
I did so, and soon began to improve; my lungs healed, the cough ceased, and I became stouter and healthier than I have ever been before. I would suggest that the name of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral be changed to Elixir of Life, for it certainly saved my life."—F. J. Olliden, Salto, Buenos Ayres.
"A few years ago I took a very bad cold, which settled on my lungs. I had night sweats, a racking cough, and great soreness. My doctor's medicine did me no good. I tried many remedies, but received no benefit; everybody despaired of my recovery. I was advised to use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and, as a last resort, did so. From the first dose I obtained relief, and, after using two bottles of it, was completely restored to health."—F. Adams, New Gretna, N. J.
