CHAPTER XXIII.

"Now then—speak," said Allan sternly.

"Yes, I'll speak, unless you make it worth my while to be silent. I'm going to speak."

"I am not the most patient man in the world, remember," said Allan.

"You'll listen patiently enough presently. Now I'll tell you what I'll do. Give me, or promise to give me, ten thousand pounds, and I'll go away and say not a word; if not, I'll tell you all now."

"Are you mad?" said Allen scornfully.

"No; but you will be, I guess. You won't pay me the money then—to save yourself from hearing what I know."

"I would'nt pay a farthing to save you from the hangman. Go on."

"You'll ask me to stop presently. First of all, I'll tell you why I got your wife down here. I wanted her to promise to tell no one my right name for a time. She wouldn't promise, so I kept her here. She was promising when you came. She has a will of her own, but I broke it at last."

The pistol seemed striving to turn Allan's hand towards the speaker.

"Now," said Manders, "I'll tell you how I got her to come here. That's puzzling you, isn't it."

It was, but Allan would not say so.

"I told her I could bring her face to face with one of her father's murderers. You know her father John Boucher, was murdered?"

"Yes, I know it," said Allen, glad to find the true reason of his wife's excursion to B—— so clearly set out.

"Well now," said Manders, "I dare say you know that Frances is very keen upon hanging the man who killed her father. I told her some one who lived here knew all about it. She came like a shot. She's vindictive on that one thing."

"Go on," said Allan.

He saw the man was talking to a purpose.

"I wouldn't tell her who it was killed him," continued Manders, speaking very slowly, "but I mean to tell you. You will be glad to know, no doubt?"

"I shall be glad to set her doubts at rest."

"Well, then, I'll tell you what became of John Boucher. He left London and went to Blacktown; it was three years ago last winter. Shall I go on, or will you pay?"

"Go on" said Allen.

"He went from Blacktown to Sleeford Junction. At Sleeford he got into a train for Brackley. Shall I go on, or will you pay?"

"Go on you villian," said Allan, who felt his brow grow clammy.

Manders laughed his wickedest laugh.

"He got out of the train at Brackley—then a gentleman offered to drive him to Redton; but he never got to Redton alive, That gentleman, your father, my father-in-law, shot him on the road."

"You liar!" cried Allan. "The man he shot was a robber,"

"Robber or not, he was your wife's father. I told you had better pay."

Could this fellow's tale be true?

His father the slayer of John Boucher! Allan strove to scout it as a malicious invention, but he could not help thinking, whether true or not, the narrator believed it. Let it be true, it was some accident, or Frances's father was not the man she had always thought him to be. He had read and heard of men who had amassed money by highway robbery—yet to their families appeared the kindest and most respectable of creatures. Could her father have been one of these men? No matter—Frances was Frances. Her father's crimes must be kept from her notice he felt how distressed she would be at learning the true nature and persuit of the father she had loved. This villian must be lying.

"Do you mean to say," he said, scornfully, "that my wife's father was a highwayman?"

Manders laughed again.

"Oh dear, no—not at all. Your late father-in-law was a respectable, hard-working store-keeper in New York. He made money there. He was a much better man then my father-in-law."

"Speak plainly or not at all," said Allan haughtily.

"I'll speak plainly enough—oh yes! But I am going to astonish you first. I'm going to tell you who your wife is. It is about the strangest thing in the world that you should have married her."

Allan began to wonder what was coming. He had not the slightest inkling of the truth. Manders looked at him steadily.

"Your wife is the daughter of John Boucher; John Boucher was the son of James Boucher, or Bouchier, who brought three actions against the owners of Redhill, claiming the property.

Allen grew pale.

"Just before James Bouchier died he found the certificate which proved him to be legitimate. This with other papers was in his son John Boucher's possession when he went that night to Brackley. Curious he should have tried to rob and murder your father when he could claim by law every farthing he possessed."

"You are lying!" cried Allan. The insinuations Manders had made were too horrible to be for a moment entertained.

"Strange to say I'm not lying now. You'll ask for proofs. Go home and say to Josephine, 'Give me those papers you stole out of your husband's safe.' They're all in her hands—the little devil! Read them over carefully, and you'll find you've married your cousin. If it's any comfort to you, you can't be deprived of the estate—that's your wife's."

"And who are you?—you fiend!" asked Allan.

"Frances will tell you if you ask her. She's been trying to find me for a long time. Anyway, you'll guess I'm not Digby Bourchier."

"I never thought you were. I know you now; your name is Manders."

"That's it exactly. You've heard it before. Frances told you I was the only person who knew how her father died. That ought to show you I am speaking the truth. But you go to Josephine and get the papers."

The pistol was trying very hard to turn Allan's hand—so hard that Manders noticed the struggle and trembled. Allan was in deep thought.

"Now," said Manders, "if you like to pay me that money I'll go and say nothing. Frances or no one else will be the wiser; you can settle down and live at peace."

Never! If the thing were true, the consequences must be accepted. Yet, until he had his father's word for it, he would never believe the statements of this perjured impostor. And Frances—how could he meet Frances, who was waiting in the garden for him? How could he face her while there was a chance of Manders' words being true? Her father's blood on his father's hands! A burning wish seized Allan to stand face to face with his father and hear him deny it. Till that happened he could find no happiness in life. He would believe his father's word against any assertion made by this black-hearted villain.

He rose and left the room—left the house without looking again at Manders. Now he knew that Frances had been lured away and detained for the man's own evil ends, he felt he need not take the deadly vengeance he had contemplated taking. Everything now was merged into that one dread that Manders' words were true—that his father had killed John Boucher. He would go to Redhills to-night if he could catch a train. Till his father's denial took this weight from his heart he could not eat, drink nor sleep; or he fancied such actions were impossible. He went out of the house, through the window by which he had entered. He stepped out into the garden—for the sun was going down—and looked around for Frances, blaming himself for having left her alone. But the tale he had heard, he felt, was an ample excuse for his neglect.

With a lightened heart Manders saw him leave the house. He opened the front door and watched him looking about the garden in search of his wife. He smiled an evil smile as he thought that however much his own schemes went astray, he had fully quitted himself with respect to Allan. The ruffian's bones and head were aching, and he was pining for brandy.

Where was Frances? Allan sought her all over the place; he even re-entered the house and looked for her. He called her, but there was no reply. How bitterly he blamed himself for leaving her for one moment. The very vengeance he had meant to take had recoiled on his own head. Had he left Manders in silent scorn, and taken Frances away, he would not have heard a word of the dreadful accusation against his father.

Wherever his wife was, she had left "The Shrubbery." Perhaps she was weary of waiting and had gone toward home. He would follow her. No doubt she was in the waiting-room at the station.
