The Haunted House

double team came down the old dug road on the dead run, and drove up to the kitchen door. Voices hollered "Whoa"! Men jumped out and came into the kitchen. They started to build a fire, for the boys, who were awakened by the racket, heard them rattling the covers.

"I'm weak in my stomach", says George' "Do you suppose we could get out the window". Our young gallants were too frightened to move however and after awhile the ghosts or men got into their wagon and drove away across the Flat. When the sound of the wheels had died away our brave boys managed to get to the kitchen. There was the stove, cold as could be with no sign of a fire. They took their lantern and went outdoors but not a living thing to prove there had been a team or men there that night.

They decided they had beetter make for home while they had their health and strength, which they did and lost their $5 too. From that day to the day they died, there was nothing that would convince them but that the old house and Flat were haunted and good too.

The ghost ceased when the house and barn went out in the freshet of 82. Someone must have had hens in the old barn for when it passed by my father's place a rooster was on the roof crowing as much as to say: "I'm going to stick to the old haunted barn, ghost or no ghost.
