Humour: False and True.

"Nothing so foolish as the laugh of fools."—CATULLUS.

Among all kinds of writing, there is none in which authors are more apt to miscarry than in works of humour, as there is none in which they are more ambitious to excel. It is not in imagination that teems with monsters, a head that is filled with extravagant conceptions, which is capable of furnishing the world with diversions of this nature; and yet if we look into the productions of several writers, who set up for men of humour, what wild irregular fancies, what unnatural distortions of thought do we meet with? If they speak nonsense, they believe they are talking humour; and when they have drawn together a scheme of absurd inconsistent ideas, they are not able to read it over to themselves without laughing. These poor gentlemen endeavour to gain themselves the reputation of wits and humorists, by such monstrous conceits as almost qualify them for Bedlam; not considering that humour should always lie under the check of reason, and that it requires the direction of the nicest judment, by so much the more as it indulges itself in the most boundless freedoms. There is a kind of nature that is to be observed in this sort of compositions, as well as in all other; and a certain regularity of thought, which must discover the writer to be a man of sense, at the same time that he appears altogether given up to caprice. For my part, when I read the delirious mirth of an unskilful author, I cannot be so barbarous as to divert myself with it, but am rather apt to pity the man, then laugh at anything he writes.

A playwright, who had himself a great deal of the talent which I am treating of, represents a character, in one of his plays, as very much surprised to hear one say that breaking of windows was not humour; and I question not but several English readers will be as much startled to hear me affirm that many of those raving incoherent pieces, which are often spread among us under odd chimerical titles, are rather the offsprings of a distempered brain than works of humour.

It is, indeed, much easier to describe what is not humour than what is; and very difficult to define it otherwise than as Cowley has done wit, by negatives. Were I to give my own notions of it, I would deliver them after Plate's manner, in a kind of allegory, and, by supposing Humour to be a person, deduce to him all his qualifications, according to the following genealogy. Truth was the founder of the family, and the father of Good Sense. Good Sense was the father of Wit, who married a lady of collateral line called Mirth, by whom he had issue Humour. Humour, therefore, being the youngest of this illustrious family, and descended from parents of such different dispositions, is very various and unequal in his temper; sometimes you see him putting on grave looks a solemn habit, sometimes airy in his behaviour and fantastic in his dress; insomuch that at different times he appears as serious as a judge, and as jocular as a merry-andrew. But as he has a great deal of the mother in his constitution, whatever mood he is in, he never fails to make his company laugh.

But since there is an impostor abroad, who takes upon him the name of this young gentleman, and would willingly pass for him in the world; to the end that well-meaning persons may not be imposed upon by cheats, I would desire my readers, when they meet with this pretender, to look into his parentage, and to examine him strictly whether or no he be remotely allied to Truth, and lineally descended from Good Sense; if not, they may conclude him a counterfeit. They may likewise distinguish him by a loud and excessive laughter, in which he seldom gets his company to join with him. For as True Humour generally looks serious, whilst everybody laughs about him; False Humour is always laughing, whilst everybody about him looks serious. I shall only add, if he has not in him a mixture of both parents—that is, if he would pass for the offspring of Wit without Mirth, or Mirth without Wit, you may conclude him to be altogether spurious and a cheat.

The impostor of whom I am speaking descends originally from Falsehood, who was the mother of Nonsense, who was brought to bed of a son called Frenzy, who married one of the daughters of Folly, commonly known by the name of Laughter, on whom he begot that monstrous infant of which I have here been speaking. I shall set down at length the genealogical table of False Humour, and, at the same time place under it the genealogy of True Humour, that the reader may at one view behold their different pedigrees and relations:—

Falsehood.
Nonsense.
Frenzy——Laughter.
False Humour.

Truth.
Good Sense.
Wit——Mirth.
Humour.

I might extend the allegory, by mentioning several of the children of False Humour, who are more in number than the sands of the sea, and might, in particular, enumerate the many sons and daughters which he has begot in this island. But as this would be a very invidious task, I shall only observe, in general, that False Humour differs from the True, as a monkey does from a man.

First of all, He is exceedingly given to little apish tricks and buffooneries.

Secondly, He so much delights in mimicry, that it is all one to him whether he exposes by it vice and folly, luxury and avarice; or, on the contrary, virtue and wisdom, pain and poverty.

Thirdly, He is wonderfully unlucky, insomuch that he will bite the hand that feeds him, and endeavour to ridicule both friends and foes indiscriminately. For having but small talents, he must be witty he can, not where he should.

Fourthly, Being entirely void of [illegible] he pursues no point either of morality or instructions, but is ludicrous only for the sake of being so.

Fifthly, Being incapable of anything but mock representations, his ridicule is always personal, and aimed at the various man or the writer—not at the vice, or the writing.

Marry Not Without Love.

The most egregious blunder in life's history is committed when a woman marries one man and loves another. This, unfortunately, is by no means an anomalous occurrence. History repeats itself daily when women, actuated by worldly pride or influenced by friends, are led to the altar by those men whom they barely like, while in the inmost recesses of their heart they love another, and constantly long for another's sympathy, another's kiss, another's love. A woman walking the avenue of life, having made this mistake, tries to be, and sometimes fancies she is happy, but when in the solitude of her own thoughts misgivings arise which render life miserable to a degree. Let no chaste and virtuous woman, endowed with God-given attributes, plunge thoughtless into this deep and engulfing current, without seriously considering her position, for, let her be warned that the step once taken is irrevocable and life-binding, and no power on earth can relieve her misery or assist in making her life endurable. What is life without love? Pitiable indeed is that woman who, either by her voluntary act or through the influence of others, denies herself the pleasure it was the Almighty's intention she should enjoy. Take the young girl who marries an old man, and what is her life? A constant despair and longing for what might have been." A very common occurrence is the marriage of a young woman to a man who idolizes her, but for whom she has but toleration. Yet carried away by the prospect of an easy life, or influenced by parents or friends who often have a selfish motive in influencing, places herself beyond the reach of that destiny for which she was intended and for which she was created. Let sober, temperate, deliberate and mature thought be her guide, and she will then act according to her heart's promptings, and in doing thus we challenge an instance when regret has followed. It is said experience is the best of teachers, but what is experience but mature thought! Then let her be actuated by her own motives, influenced by her own desires, controlled by her own circumstances, exercise her own judgment, and abide the promptings of her own heart, and we shall have fewer unhappy marriages.

VARIOUS MATTERS.

[illegible] may be a dear teacher, but she isn't any dearer than a pretty schoolma'am.—Oil City Derrick.

Did you ever reckon up the number of people you would like to kick if they were not rich?—Danbury News.

A Mr. Crank once kept a bank
Which plously he ran,
He preached and prayed and people said
He was an honest man.

The editor of the Hackensack Republican went to call on his girl, when he saw on the front steps a sign which said, "Beware of the paint." He went away sighing, "I never before knew that she fainted."

A medical professor says of tobacco:—"It is killing more people than whiskey. Particularly the smoking of cigarettes is baneful. The arteries become excited and ruptured by it, and they often snap the brain.

Ah Chung, a San Francisco murderer, has kicked the bucket, literally as well as metaphorically. A prison-keeper found him hanging by the neck in his cell. He had passed a cord through the air-holes at the back of his cell, fastened that end, made a noose of the other end, put out the gas, and planted himself upon a water-bucket. Then he kicked the bucket.

An instance of the ruling passion strong in death is afforded by a man who used to bet at every opportunity. The doctor came and told him he could not live two hours. The poor fellow thought a moment and then brightening up said, "Doctor, I'll bet you a bottle of champagne that I'll live three hours;" and summoning his strength he just won the bet by five minutes, and then died.

They were sitting in an open buggy on the cross-road, and bounded on one side by the wood and on the other by an orchard. The first we heard was, "Now stop, Will, you will muss my hair." He laughed and she broke out with, "You don't love me one bit." The caress he gave her would have made an anaconda turn pale, and as she threw up her head for breath, he said, "I'm strong, eh, girl?" "Yes, you are; but I don't think you are as strong as you used to be." And then we felt weak and left them.

The barbers of this country have an acknowledged enemy in Dr. A. B. Butcher of Cleveland, who maintains that shaving is in violation of every law of health and beauty. He says the moustache is the best respirator in the world, and the hair covering the jaws and throat is intended to give warmth and protection to the delicate structures in the vicinity, especially the fauces and larynx. Shaving, he says, leads to dental neuralgia, rheumatism of the gums, weak eyes and catarrhal disorders. The doctor, however, fails to declare how it is that nature did not inspect women with these hirsute dignities, these capillary beauties of the countenance.

Physicians are well agreed that the use of tobacco by growing boys is full of danger. Recent investigations—especially in France—have demonstrated that a whole train of nervous diseases are to be traced to this practice. If you want to stop growing, if you want to have a set of nerves that are like those of an invalid old lady, if you wish to grow feeble and thin, if you wish to grow sallow and puny, I do not know any better way than to smoke tobacco, especially cigarettes. It will make a drain of your nervous system, which will be sure to tell [illegible] while. Let us hope that if a thousand this some of them will be [illegible] which most

In Falls county, Tex., a Miss Moore was preparing for marriage, and invited a friend, Miss Williams, to assist her. In rummaging through some clothes, an old pistol was carelessly handled by Miss W., resulting in the shooting and instant death of Miss Moore. She was buried on the day that was to have been the nuptial occasion, and the other young lady, who was the innocent cause of it, has become deranged.

Both Houses of Congress met 2nd inst. President Hayes' message was read. The Southern question, including reference to the late election frauds, was discussed at greater length than any other subject, and important suggestions were made looking to a more rigid enforcement of laws for the protection of the elective franchise. The near approach to specie resumption, yellow fever scourge, the Indian problem, fishery award and Mexican border questions were treated at considerable length, and other topics of less general importance receive proper consideration.

Samuel Myers of Dallas, Texas, is now lying sick with a terrible and singular malady. While asleep the other day a strange fly alighted near his nostrils and remained for a few moments when it was driven away. Upon awakening he felt a tickling sensation in his nose, but it was not until his eyes and face had become fearfully swollen that the physicians discovered that he was afflicted with the terrible screw-worm, which hatch out in half an hour from eggs laid by the peculiar fly above mentioned, but which usually attack only cattle and sheep. Chloroform and carbolic acid was injected into his nostrils and 152 of the worms dislodged, but at last accounts he was in a critical condition, with small hopes of his recovery.

Few romances in legends are based on a more pathetic incident than one from the actual present which comes from the lake country of Ireland. A member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, unmindful of the rigid regulations of the police service, took the colleen of his heart to the alter without receiving the permission of his superiors. After his marriage was reported at headquarters attempts were made to secure a relaxation of the rules in his case, for he was a popular and efficient officer. Not even at the instance of Cupid could the rigid laws of the police be waived. Poor Roe—this was the officers name—must leave the force; such was the steern order. He prepared to start for Australia with his young wife, consoled by her love for and sacrifice he had made. Happy in their honeymoon, he and his bride sailed up Lough Erne for Enniskillen to make final preparations for their departure from Ireland. At the landing-place his wife fell into the water while stepping from the steamer. With the quickness of thought he plunged in to save her. Losing all presence of mind, she, in her struggle for life, entwined her arms around him, and before any assistance could be [illegible] both sank to rise no [illegible]

Valuable Information.
MR. H. R. STEVENS, BOSTON, MASS.
Dear Sir,—My only object in giving you this testimonial is to spread valuable information. Having been badly afflicted with Salt Rheum, and the whole surface of my skin being covered with pimples and eruptions, many of which caused me great pain and annoyance, and knowing it to be a blood disease, I took many of the advertised blood remedies, among which, was any quantity of Sarsaparilla, without obtaining any benefit until I commenced taking the VEGETINE, and before I had completed the first bottle, I saw that I had got the right medicine. Consequently I followed on with it until I had taken seven bottles, when I was pronounced a well man, and my skin is smooth and entirely free from pimples and eruptions. I have never enjoyed so good health before, and I attribute it all to the use of VEGETINE. To benefit those afflicted with Rheumatism, I will make mention also of the VEGETINE's wonderful power of curing me of this acute complaint of which I have suffered so intensely.
