Third Division of Profits MINERS' LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY of London, ESTABLISHED 1836.

AT the Third Quinquennial Meeting of this Company, held in London, 24th June, 1852, a Surplus of £42,400 Sterling, (being four-fifths of £53,000 Sterling) was declared distributable amongst the Policy holders entitled to participate. This sum allows of a reduction of Premium for the next five years, of £9,633 16s. 3d. Sterling, per annum, or an equivalent reversionary Bonus payable at Death, of £68,939 10s. 7d.

The reduction of Premium averages 35,22 per cent. on the Premiums payable during the next five years.

The reversionary Bonus averages 60 per cent, on the Premiums received during the last five years, or 9 per cent. on the sums Assured.

Upon the Policies which had been full five years in existence, the reversionary Bonus averages 2 1-2 per cent. Premium on the sum assured, a result which has been seldom equalled, and will bear comparison with that of any Office.

The following Table illustrates the Bonuses declared:

		Average Reduction of Premium.	Average Reversionary Bonus
1st Division—	1842	16.833 per cent.	31 per cent
2d. "	1847	31.333 "	53½ "
3d. "	1852	35.22 "	60 "

On the 31st December last, the Existing Assurances were	£1,099,813	10	2
The Capital Funds of the Company were	230,262	15	6
The Annual Income was	47,721	2	6
The Divisible Surplus was	53,000	0	0

The Directors consider, and I trust the Policy holders will agree with them, that the position of the Company is highly satisfactory, and hope that, taking into account the continually increasing competition they have to encounter, the progress of the Company has equalled their expectations, as the benefits actually realized equal, and in most cases surpass, those afforded by the largest established Offices.

Oct. 15. S. L. TILLEY,

MISCELLANY.

The Satisfaction of a Gentleman.

"Sir, I will have satisfaction!"

The words were uttered in a loud and angry tone by a military-looking personage in the saloon of one of our most respectable clubs, frequented by opulent merchants, country squires, bankers and lords, with a sprinkling of naval and military gentlemen.

"Sir, I will have satisfaction!" So saying, and buttoning up his military surtout with the air of a man who has determined on some desperate course, the offended hero vanished out of the room. He was immediately observed to mount a handsome phaeton drawn by a pair of smart greys. His tiger leaped up behind, and the equipage drove off with a furious clatter up St. James street.

Scarcely had the gentleman of wounded honor rushed out of the house, ere the friends of the other assembled round him to ask "What is the matter? And how did you fall out?

"The matter," said the offending gentleman who sat somewhat stupified at the abrupt and threatening exit of his military friend; "why, the fellow is as irascible as a turkey-cock. We fell into a dispute about politics, about which he knows positively nothing. He became more and more insolent, and his arguments were at length so absurd, that I could not help bursting out laughing, and telling him he was a bullet-headed fool."

"Is that all!" said a city merchant: "why, every body knew that long ago!"

"Ay, but to tell him of it," added another; "I fear mischief will come of it."

A considerable damp seemed to have been thrown upon the spirits of the company, and the circle gradually broke up. The gentleman who had been the cause of the explosion, at length rose and went home, not over-free from anxiety. He now regretted the use of the offensive word, and he felt that it had not been undeserved. Not being a military man—for he was a banker in good business, and with extensive connections—he could scarcely divine what the other would do in reference to the "satisfaction" which he had spoken of; yet he had some unpleasant misgivings about the issue.

The banker was not left long in doubt.—Next morning, after an anxious night, a thundering rat tat came to the door. Immediately thereafter a gentleman was admitted. The banker rose up to meet him, and recognized him for a military gentleman—in fact the major of the others's corps.

"I have the honor," said he, "of waiting upon you at the instance of my friend, the Hon. Captain Sir Eustace Fitz Giles; the letter will explain to you the object of my visit."

The banker opened the missive. It was written in a thunder and lightening hand, and smelt frightfully of gunpowder; in fact there was no misunderstanding it.

"I will call upon the captain," said the banker. "I will do so at once," "The usual mode in such matters, as you are aware, it is to refer me to your friend."

"In good time, Sir," answered the banker; "but first I would see the captain himself."

"Very well," said the major; "but the usual course in such matters—"

"Yes, yes!" said the banker; "I know; but I wish to see the captain himself."

"He will refer you to me," said the major.

"Very well! then I shall have the pleasure of seeing you again;" and he bowed the major politely out.

The banker went straightway to the choleric [illegible] and begs to inform his friends and the public at large, that he has lately removed his establishment to the above House, 16 miles from this City, 1 mile North of Hammond River Bridge, where he is prepared to entertain Travellers at all times and seasons.

Oct. 15. S. L. TILLEY, tant family group, "but I could not settle them. I have settled every thing else" The banker's second now ventured to observe, that as the captain's second had admitted the parties about to contend were not on equal terms, they should be made equal, or as near as possible so, before the actual commencement of hostilities; and he appealed to them to do this as "men of honor and gentlemen."

"Well, there is certainly a show of reason, and that sort of thing in what you say," observed the major. "But how in the name of goodness, is that to be effected?"

"Nothing easier," exclaimed the gentleman in black. "Your friend the captain has an independent income of fifteen hundred per annum, and no family; whereas the income of my friend—though he has some little property—mainly depends upon his own exertions: and he has a wife and three children. Now, if the captain should shoot him, he ought to make over five hundred a year to his family, and thus the parties would be upon equal terms."

"Putting affection out of the question," added the banker.

The major at this looked blank and puzzled: the captain all astonishment.

"It would only be putting down your handsome phaeton and pair," rejoined the banker's second.

"Oh, sir! yes, indeed!" ejaculate I the captain, reddening up to the ears.

"But supposing I acceded to this most irregular proceeding," said the major, "there is no time for it now, as I cannot consent to withdraw my principal from the field without an exchange of shots,"

"This is not at all necessary," said the banker. "This, gentleman is my attorney." Whereat, on the instant, the little man in black whipped from beneath his coat a deed of parchment, ready filled up, and wanting nothing but the attachment of the signatures.

The captain and the major exchanged looks of blank rage. They saw that, in common parlance, it was "a sell;" and they began to storm.

"A most absurd proceeding!—mercenary proposal!", ejaulated the captain, "Put down my phaeton indeed? Why, sir, this is beyond a joke.

"It is, indeed, a most serious matter, sirs," said the banker. "do you think, sir, whether I would not be justified in considering it as something more than an "absurd proceeding" and a pretty "joke," to be put down dead here, and leave my wife and children to penury? I know very well, sir, you are a rare shot and can snuff a candle with a pistole bullet. That dexterity I can't pretend to, so in any case I run the gratest risk. Yet I am ready to pit my life against your phaeton and pair."

The major looked more perplexedly than ever. The captain more foolish and puzzled.

"Again, gentlemen, if I should be killed, my wife and children will absolutely need the money; but if I kill the captain, his property is absolutely of no sort of use to him after his funeral expenses are paid. Nor is my proposal without precedent. Upon such occasions, men of refined honor and high courage have thought they could have done enough. When Best shot Lord Camelford, his lordship, on his deathbed left his antagonist, who was in very poor circumstances, a handsome income rejoicing, no doubt, that he had lived long enough to do such an act of magnanimity and finished honor. I never fired at a man as a mark in my life; I am sure to be shot. So you see my proposal is only a fair one; and as I make it to men of honor, I expect it to be acceded to."

"Oh, but!—yes, but!—you sir!" exclaimed the captain. "Really," interrupted the major lifting his hand, "I really think that, as men of honor and honor we must accede to the proposal."

The banker now flatly refused to fight on any other terms, putting it directly to the major as the most-refined point of duelling honor that could be manifested on the occasion, till the two officers, though excessively provoked and annoyed, could no longer refuse their consent. The parchment was handed to them by the attorney who saw it properly signed and then the principals took their stand at fifteen paces distance.

The banker had the first fire. Not wishing to be banished his country, or get into prison, or be tried for manslaughter or murder, he took very good care to fire wide of his mark, and away flew his innocent ball, like a humming bird, across the fields.

Then came the captain's turn. "Now," whispered the major, "aim low; keep steady—now—you've got him."

"Got him!" stamered the captain, his face turning blue and his jaws falling. "Got him! put down my Phae--, pay five hundred a year for being called a bullet-headed fool, and so prove it. Will you pay the money if I hit him?"

Away sped the ballet; but of course it did not hit the banker, though it whistled rather too close past the lawyer's ear, who had forgotten to have a similiar agreement for himself in case of accidents.

The antagonists then shook hands. The major withdrew the Honorable Captain Eustace Fitz-Giles from the field, declaring that "his honor was satisfied;" and the banker went home to his wife and children.

But it is not always that those "meetings of honor" so end.

THE LIVERPOOLIAN PROFESSOR AND THE YANKEE.—As Professor Anderson was looking over the various American and European newspapers, which are to be found in the publication office of the Boston Daily Times he was closely scrutinized by a gentleman of tall stature and rather swarthy appearance evidently not a Bostonian. This individual, after a short space had elapsed at length mustered courage, and thus addressed the "Wizard:" "I say! are you Professor Anderson, hey?" "Yes sir." "Wall, you're a tarnation smart man, I hear. You aint got that are bottle of yours with ye, have you?" "No, sir." "Well I'm from down East; having been raised in Maine, and I should like to purchase a duplicate of that are bottle, as I am about going out stumping for ———, I guess if I had your bottle or its twin-brother, I'd soon swamp the Scotties, without talking much politics, either." "I never carry my bottle with me, nor have I a duplicate of it." "Sorry for that, sir," said the ——— stamper; "However," he continued, "I was once taught a trick, when a boy, but I almost forgot how the thing was done now. I'll tell what it was, stranger, as near as I can. I used to take a red cent and change it into a ten dollar gold piece." "Oh," said the Professor, "that is quite easy, for it is mere trick of sleight of hand." "Well, I know it is not very difficult but as I forget how, will you show me" at the same time handing a cent to the Wizard.

"Oh yes, sir is it will oblige you I will show you in a moment. "Hold out your hand," said the Wizard. "This is your cent, is it not?" "Yes sir." "Close your hand." The Down Easter closed his hand fast.——"Are you sure you have it?" said the Wizard. "I guess I have," said he, "and I'll bet a dollar you can't change it into a ten dollar gold piece." "Done," said the Wizard. "Now hold fast." "Yes sir! I reckon I will—but stop! down with your dollar! here is mine!" said the Yankee. The Wizard covered his dollar. "Now, sir, are you ready?" said the Wizard. "I aint nothing else, sir." "Change!" said the Wizard "Now, sir, open your hand." He did so, and to his utter astonishment he beheld a note in his hand. "Well, sir," said the Wizard, "you see you have lost your dollar." "Now," says the Professor, "I'll bet you another dollar I'll change the ten dollar piece into your cent again, and much quicker." "No yer don't," said the gent from Maine, placing the ten dollars in his pocket, and buttoning up rig't, "I'm much obliged to you, Professor, but I reckon I'll leave it as it is. Good morning, sir, as ever." said he, walking out of the office, and turning round as he reached the door, he place his digitals in a peculiar position, with the thumb in close approximation to his proboscis, saying, "I guess there aint any green about this chile;" and left the Professor in utter amazement at his coolness.—Boston Times.

KIRWAN'S LETTERS TO CHIEF JUSTICE TANEY.

LETTER XVI.

The Mass not the worship of God.—A theatrical Exhibition.—Waldensian Church in Turin.—High Ceremonies of Rome all theatrical—Feast of the Nativity.—Visit of the Wise Men.—Procession of Palms.—Judgment-hall of Pilate.—Procession at Bonville.—Sabbath evening Service in Edinburgh.—Popish Plays and Players not suited to America.

MY DEAR SIR,—I hope that by this time your mind, and those of my readers, are prepared for the conclusion to which my own has long since arrived—that Romanism is not Christianity; and that its priests, whatever else they may be, are not the ministers of Christ, nor of his glorious Gospel. If this conclusion is just, another immediately follows; neither is its worship of God. If not prepared for this conclusion now, you may be at the close of the present letter, in which I shall endeavour to establish its truth.

The Scriptures speak of various kinds of worship; as, the worship of God—the worship of idols—the worship of the dragon and the beast—and the worship of devils. And we find various kinds of worship in the world, and under various forms. Some truly worship God in spirit and in truth—some worship idols—some devils—some mammon—some are "willworshippers"—and some worship "they know not what;" but all is in vain, save that of "the circumcision, which worship God in spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." Acceptable worship embraces the outward homage, and the inward feeling; but the external act is nothing, save as it expresses the sincere internal feeling; for they who worship God must worship him in spirit and in truth. True worship is not confined to places, occasions, or persons; wherever the heart bows in humility before God, for the purpose of exalting his glorious name and perfections, there he is truly worshipped. And, as God is the father of all men, all men have access to Him for themselves, through his Son. All this is plain.

The worship of Romanism consists mainly in the Mass. There are missals, and penances, and prayers for private use; and there are high ceremonies for certain feasts and great occasions; but the Mass—the mass mumbled over in the same way in Connaught, Paris, and Rome, and with the same sleepy, unvarying monotony, is that which makes up the public worship of the people. Now what is the Mass? is it worship? I unhesitatingly say it is not; that it has no more claim to be the worship of God than had the ceremonies of Pagan priests at the altars of Pagan Rome. At best it is only a theatrical representation of the truths which it purports to exhibit. And hence, Bishop England, and other Papal writers, talk of the "performance of the mass," as we ordinarily speak of the performance of a tragedy or a farce. And the Mass holds precisely the same relation to the history of Christ which Richard III., Henry VIII., John II., or any other of the historical plays of Shakspeare do to the characters and times which they represent. This even a superficial anatomy of the Mass will render quite evident.

As the sensuous encroached on the spiritual in Christianity, and as the shades of that long night called "the Dark Ages" thickened over our world, all the tendencies of religion were to the outward. The Bible was soon confined to cloisters, and it became the interests of priests to keep it there. To keep up the great facts of our religion in some way before the people, portions of sacred history were dramatised, and acted before the faithful. And this system, somewhat modified in different countries to suit the different states of civilization, exists at the present day. To see the system in full operation, you must go to Rome, where the tragedy and the farce are performed in gorgeous style.

But I must return to the "performance of the Mass." in which, "under the appearance of bread and wine, the Redeemer of the world is offered up in an unbloody manner, as a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead."—according to Dr. England, the altar signifies Christ—the white cloth that covers it, "the purity which should accompany Christ"—and the vestments of the priests are to remind us of the passion of Christ. The albe represents the white garment in which Herod clad the Saviour—the cincture reminds us that Christ was bound—the manciple hanging upon the left arm, reminds us of the weight of our sins as borne by Christ—the stole on the priest's neck and crossed on the breast, represents the obedience of the Son of God—the chasible, or outward vestment, with a hole in the centre for the head, with a cross embroidered on the back, and two stripes representing a pillar on the front, reminds us of Christ bearing the Cross. When the priest is thus dressed up, he is prepared for acting. The water and wine are then brought out—they are turned into the body and blood of the Lord, by the priest—then, as real Christ, he is offered as a victim to God on behalf of the people—then the victim undergoes a destructive change, to shew the death of the Redeemer—then the elements are separated, the real body is seen under the appearance of bread, and the real blood under the appearance of wine, and the priest eats the one, and drinks the other. Then the people are dismissed, if true believers, wonderfully edified and instructed—if not, smiling at the credulity of those who can believe that there is any worship in all this! This is the Mass! Now, Sir, if this is any thing but a theatrical representation of the death of Christ, with finite meaning and less sense, in which the altar is the stage, the priest the chief actor, the people the spectators, and the church the theatre, what is it? And when, as in high mass, the dramatis personæ are multiplied, and opera singers are brought in to give attraction to the various scenes, the conclusion is irresistible that, instead of being engaged in the worship of God, you are actually witnessing a theatrical exhibition.

Never did I feel this to such an extent as in June last, when, after weeks spent amid the mass-houses of France, and Naples, and Rome, I entered, on a pleasant Sabbath morning, the extremely plain and primitive-looking church of the Waldenses, in Turin. On looking around me, instead of pictures and statuary, and frescoes, I found all the walls presenting to the eye some passages of Scripture. On looking before me, instead of an altar blazing with candles and glazing, I saw a neat pulpit, with a large open Bible, and a minister of God reading and expounding it. Instead of persons gazing around with guide-books in their hands, talking and criticising, and smiling, I saw a devout people with bibles in their hands, turning up the text, and the passages read, and most devoutly singing God's praises, and joining in the prayers that were offered! The sight and the scene were truly refreshing to a mind jaded, and a heart disgusted with all I had witnessed for the few previous weeks. The transition seemed like passing from Purgatory to Paradise. Here was worship in spirit and in truth, while the gorgeous and heartless ceremonies or splendid cathedrals were a mere acting, and by wretched actors, of truths and things which neither priests nor people understood.

And this theatrical aspect of the Popish ritual is yet more apparent, if you pass from the mass to the ceremonies of some of the high days of the Church. Seven or, in his pilgrimage to Rome, has made this quite obvious as well as ludicrous. In St. Maria Magiscore, in Rome, they profess to have the cradle in which the Saviour was laid at his birth, and at the feast of the Nativity they bring out that cradle, before the dawn of day, and, amid processions of priests, monks, nuns, preceded by incense, accompanied by singers, and guarded by soldiers, it is placed on the high altar for the view and worship of the faithful! And, after all, the wonderful cradle is only a splinter of old wood covered with silver, and in a case of glass, and said to be a part of the manger. And the theatrical acting of the Nativity attracts its thousands
