THE BRIDAL WINE CUP.

"Pledge with wine—pledge with wine," cried the young and thoughtless Harvey Wood; "with wine," ran through the brilliant crowd.

The beautiful bride grew pale—the decisive hour had come. She pressed her white hands together, and the leaves of her bridal wreath trembled on her pure brow; her breath came quicker, and her heart beat wilder.

"Yes, Marion, lay aside your scruples for this once," said the Judge, in a low tone, going towards his daughter, "the company except it. Do not so seriously infringe upon the rules of etiquette; in your own home act as you please; but in mine, for this once, please me.

Every eye was turned towards the bridal pair. Marion's principles were well known. Henry had been a convivialist, but of late his friends noticed the change in his manners, the difference in his habits—and to-night they watched him to see, as they sneeringly said, if he was tied down to a woman's opinion.

Pouring a briming beaker, they held it with tempting smiles toward Marion. She was very pale, though more composed, and her hand shook not, as smiling back, she gracefully accepted the crystal tempter, and raised it to her lips. But scarcely had she done so, when every hand was arrested by her piercing exclamation of "oh! how terrible."

"What is it?" cried one and all, thronging together, for she had slowly carried the glass at arm's length, and was fixedly regarding it as thought it were some hideous object.

"Wait," she answered, while an inspired light shone from her dark eyes," "wait, and I will tell you, I see,' she added, slowly, pointing one jeweled finger at the sparkling ruby liquid—a sight that beggars all description, and yet listen—I will paint it for you if I can. It is a lonely spot; tall mountains crowned with verdure rise in awful sublimity around; a river runs through and bright flowers grow to the water's edge. There is a thick warm mist, that the sun seeks vainly to pierce. Trees, lofty and beautiful, wave to the airy motion of the birds; but there—a group of Indians gather; they flit to and fro with something like sorrow upon their dark brows. And in their midst lies a manly form—but his cheek how deathly, his eye wild with the fitful fire of fever. One friend stands beside him nay, I should say kneels; for see, he is pillowing that poor head upon his breast.

"Genius in ruins—oh! the high, holy looking brow! why should death mark it, and he so young. Look how he throws back the damp curls! see him clasp his hands! hear his shrilling shrieks for life! mark how he clutches at the form of his companion, implored to be saved. Oh! see him twine his fingers together as he shrieks for his sister—the twin of his soul—weeping for him in his distant native land.

"See!" she exclaimed, while the bridal party shrank back, the untasted wine trembling in their faltering grasp, and the Judge fell, overpowered, upon his seat—"see! his arms are lifted to heaven—he prays, how wildly, for mercy! hot fever rushes through his veins. The friend beside him is weeping; awe-stricken, the dark men move silently away, and leave the living and the dying together."

There was a hush in that princely parlor, broken only by what seemed a smothered sob from some manly bosom. The bride stood yet upright, with quivering lip, and tears stealing to the outward edge of her lashes. Her beautiful arm had lost its tension, and the glass, with its little troubled red waves, came slowly towards the range of her vision. She spoke again; every lip was mute. Her voice was low, faint, yet awfully distinct; she still fixed her sorrowful glance upon the wine-cup.

"It is evening now; the great white moon is coming, up and his beams lay gently on his forehead. He moves not; his eyes are set in their sockets; dim are their piercing glances; in vain his friends whisper the name of father and sister—death is there. Death and no soft hand, no gentle voice to bless and soothe him. His head sinks back! one convulsive shudder! he is dead!"

A groan ran through the assembly, so vivid was her description, so unearthly her look, so inspired her manner, that what she described seemed actually to have taken place then and there. They noticed also that the bride groom hid his face in his hands and was weeping.

"Dead!" she repeated again, her lips quivering faster and faster, and her voice more broken; "and there they scoop him a grave, and there, without a shroud, they lay him down in that damp reeking earth. The only son of a proud father, the only idolized brother of a fond sister. And he sleeps to-day in that distant country, with no stone to mark the spot. There he lies—my father's son—my own twin brother!—a victim to this deadly poison. Father," she exclaimed, turning suddenly, while the tears rained down her beautiful cheeks, "father, shall I drink it now?"

The form of the old Judge was convulsed with agony. He raised not his head, but in a smothered voice he faltered—"No, no, my child, in God's name—no.

She lifted the glittering goblet, and letting it suddenly fall to the floor, it was dashed in a thousand pieces. Many a tearful eye watched her movement, and instantaneously every wine-glass was transferred to the marble table on which it had been prepared. Then as she looked at the fragments or crystal, she turned to the company, saying "let no friend hereafter, who loves me, tempt me to peril my soul for wine. Not firmer are the everlasting hills than my resolve, God helping me, never to taste or touch that terrible poison. And he to whom I have given my hand—who watched over my brother's dying form in that solemn hour, and buried the dear wanderer there by the river in that land of gold, will, I trust, sustain me in that resolve. Will you not my husband?"

His glistening eyes, his sad, sweet smile was her answer. The Judge left the room, and when an hour after he returned, and with a more subdued manner took part in the entertainment of the bridal guests, no one could fail to read that he, too, had determined to banish the enemy at once and forever from his princely home.

Those who were present at that wedding, can never forget the impression so solemnly made. Many from that hour forex vore the social glass.

HONESTY.

A Quaker passing through a market stopped at a stall, and enquired the price of citron.

"I have none; said the honest countryman, 'that will suit you; they are decayed, and their flavour is gone.'

'Thank thee, friend; I will go to the next stand.'

'Hast thou good fruit to day?' said he to the dealer.

'Yes sir here are some of the finest nutmegs of my garden. They are small, but rich of their kind.'

'Then thou canst recommend them?.

'Oh certainly sir.'

'Very well; I will take two.' He carried them and they proved not only unsound, but miserably tasteless.

The next morning, he again repaired to the same place. The man who sold him the fruit the preceding day asked him if he would like some more.

'Nay, friend, thou hast deceived me once, and now although thou mayest speak the truth, still I cannot trust thee; but thy neighbour chose to deal uprightly with me, and from henceforth I shall be his patron. Thou wouldst, do well to remember this, and learn by experience, a lie is a base thing in the beginning, and a very unprofitable one in the end!

INFLUENCE OF LITTLE THINGS.—It is remarkable how little is required to excite a love of horticultural pursuits, even in situations supposed to deaden the higher class of emotions. A story is told of a whole village in the Highlands being stimulated to enter on a course of improvement, from the simple circumstance of a lady one day expressing her admiration of a single marigold, which grew in the neglected garden of one of the cottagers. "Is it possible," thought the proprietor of this little flower, "that anything I have in my poor garden is worthy of the approval of a lady; If so, I will endeavour to make things better; I will try my hand at a few more flowers." Thus reasoning, the cottager began to occupy himself in his garden; neighbours followed his example; a spirit of rivalry was begun, and lo! in a short time, the whole village, interior, exterior assumed quite an improved aspect—clean doorway, walls nicely decorated with flowers, and general advancement in all matters of taste. Now, this anecdote, which rests on authority, affords a pretty fair specimen of what may be done by a little judiciously administered approbation acting upon a spirit of honourable competition.—Philadelphia Post.

EXTRAORDINARY FEROCITY OF A HORSE.—A case of ferocity in a horse rarely equalled has given rise to law proceedings before the courts of Rouen. On the 24th of November last a farmer named Blanchard, of Verclive (Eure), possessed a horse; and in his presence, and without consent, a horse-dealer named Lavoipierre, sold it to a farmer named Delaisement, of Corny. The latter, however, refused to receive it, on the ground that he had learnt that it was vicious and dangerous. In returning, the horse several times attempted to throw the young man, and at length, became quite furious at the restraint which the rider imposed on him, he bounded erect in the air, and succeeded in getting him off his back. The animal then rushed on him, bit him on the breast, and tried to trample on him. The young man defended himself as well as he was able, but the horse caught the flesh of his thigh in his teeth, and tore it off in the most savage manner, leaving the bone exposed. He then went some little distance, and with his fore-paws formed a hole of some depth; and then, returning to his victim who was lying almost senseless on the ground, he smelt around him, as if reflecting how he could best drag him to the hole. Some noise, however, at the moment struck his ear, and he galloped home. When he arrived his mouth was stained with blood, and bits of flesh were still adhearing to it. The young man who was so deadfully treated had to have his leg amputated. He subsequently brought an action against Blanchard, Delaisement, and Lavoipierre, to recover damages.

DISCOVERY OF ROMAN MEDALS.—Recently, as a young girl was digging in the garden of a farm at St. Paul de Varax, (Ain,) in France, she turned up a Roman tile, under which was a vase full of medals, but so corroded and stuck together, that it was necessary to break the vessel to get them out. The medals were found to be four hundred in number, nineteen of them in bronze, and the rest in silver. Twenty-five of them, on being cleaned, were found to wear the effigy and name of the Roman Emperors Alexander Severus, Maximus, Gordian, Philip, Decius, and Gallien, who succeeded each other from the commencement to the middle of the third century, (from 222 to 268 after Christ.) The same vase contained jewels, two chains, and seven rings in gold, in a perfect state of preservation. There were also two necklaces. One, formed of fine rings, is in perfect preservation. It is terminated by a small ornament like a wheel, the centre of which is formed of an emerald, with a gold clasp, similar to those now in use. The other, which is incomplete, is ornamented with small stones, or pieces of glass. The rings found are large but not very massive. They are ornamented with agates, engraved with various devices, which are very finely executed.—London Galignani.

WALKING IS GOOD.—Walking is good, not stepping from shop to shop, or neighbour to neighbour, but stretching out far into the country to the freshest fields, and highest ridges, and quietest lanes. However sullen the imagination may have among its griefs at home, here it cheers up and smiles. However listless the limbs may have been when sustaining a two heavy heart, here they are braced, and the lagging gait becomes buoyant again. The mere breathing of the cool wind on the face in the commonest highway, is rest and comfort, which must be felt at such times to be believed. It is disbelieved in the shortest intervals between its season of enjoyment; and every time the sufferer resolves to go forth to meet it, it penetrates to the very heart in glad surprise. The fields are better still, for there is the lark to fill up the hours with mirthful music, or at the worst the robin and the flocks of goldfinches, to show that the hardest day has its life and hilarity. But the calmest region is the upland, where human life is spread out beneath the bodily eye—where the eye moves from the peasant's nest to the spiry town, from the school-house to the churchyard, from the diminished team in the patch of tillage, or the fisherman's boat in the cove, to the viaduct that spans the valley or the fleet that glides, ghostlike, in the horizon.—Miss Martineau.

The folly of connubial quarrelling was strikingly illustrated in Lowell the other day. The better half of a Mr. Evans got angry with him and sought satisfaction by cutting off the head of his portrait. The poignant husband flew to the law for satisfaction on his part, and protection for the future, and the result was that Mrs. Evans was fined, and—Mr. Evans had to pay the fine!

Nothing is worse for the imagination than victuals. We doubt whether even a Shakespeare could utter a good sentiment while labouring under the leaden influence of a sumptuous repast. The man who could write a sonnet with a pickled pig's foot in his stomach, could perform miracles—could send himself up Niagara in a potash kettle, or crush the Alps with a lemon squeezer.

Bulwer makes one of his characters divide the human family into classes, those who are wise and those who are not. This is not equal to the French quack doctor, who divided all diseases into two classes, viz:—"Of one you die—of the other you didn't." (This reminds us of the man who could only recognize two tunes, one of which was Old Hundred, and the other wasn't.)
