THE PRINTER.

[FOR THE ST. JOHN CHRONICLE.]

SIR—Although the following lines have before appeared in print, yet the last verse possesses something so worthy the serious consideration of your readers that I request your insertion of it.

Yours, &c.,
A TYPO.

Who is he that with stick and rule,
Chastises well the knave and fool,
And keeps in awe the party tool?
The Printer.

By whom is it that learning's got,
And genius to perfection brought,
Oh! render say, say is it not
The Printer!

Who is it brings you from a far,
Intelligence of a bloody war,
Or feats of some immortal tar?
The Printer.

You politicians, you can tell
Who makes you understand so well,
The affairs on which you love to dwell,
The Printer.

Then in no case should you delay,
Though MANY no from day to day,
With punctuality to pay
The Printer.

Select Reading.

THE NAPIER AND THE GRAHAM.

A NAUTICAL VAUDEVILLE.

The ADMIRALTY—The First Lord is discovered in an easy chair, and reading the papers, apparently much amused with their contents.

Sir James—Dear me, dear me! Shocking mismanagement, upon my word; shocking, indeed. Poor Newcastle! (Reads.) 'No arrangement, no system, everybody at cross-purposes in the Crimea.' Very sad. Ha! ha! An amiable man—too amiable—but very incapable. Ha! ha! How he does catch it! Sidney Herbert, too—they give it to him hot and hot. Ha! ha! I ought to be thankful. My lines have fallen in pleasant places. Not much to annoy me. Expeditions out of my hands. Sadly severe, these papers; but perhaps where men require, like my friends Dukey and Sid, to be kept up to the collar, a good whip hand is the right thing. (Reads.) Helpless and brainless, those who should administer the system——

SERVANT ENTERS.

Servant—Sir Charles Napier, my Lord.

Sir James (discomforted)—the d—ear old fellow! Show him, instantly. (Aside.) Confound him; when I'm alone, too. I wish the porter downstairs was a policeman.

ENTER SIR CHARLES.

Sir James (radiantly)—Ha! my dear Sir Charles, welcome home; welcome to the shores of old England, the land of the free, ha! ha! Give us your hand, my old sea-dog.

Sir Charles (sternly, and putting his hands behind him)—I didn't come here to shake hands with Sir James Graeme, but report myself to the First Lord of the Admiralty.

Sir James—Ha! ha! Very good—very good. I wish Bernni Osborne had seen that—what a capital imitation he would have given. Excellent, my dear fellow, excellent. I suppose you have been acting amateur plays in the Baltic?

Sir Charles—Acting a force. Sir, an abominable force, Sir James Graham, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Sir James (surprised)—Why, fighting Charley! declare I could almost believe you in earnest.

Sir Charles (furious) Don't call me Fighting Charley, Sir. None of your taunts, and scoffs, and sneers, Sir. I understand you.

Sir James (silkily—If I am to understand you, my dear admiral, I must ask you to sit down and speak calmly and temperately.

Sir Charles (bumps into a chair.)—Very well, Sir. Do as I'm bid. That line's everything. You're on your own quarter-deck here, and have a right to give orders. Now then.

Sir James (blandly)—The initiative is palpably with yourself, my dear Sir Charles.

Sir Charles—Hang your initiatives and your palabilities, too Sir, am an old salt, Sir.

Sir. James (maliciously,—Salt which we rather hoped to put upon the tail of the Russian eagle—but Fate decreed it otherwise.

Sir Charles—Fate Sir. No such thing, Sir. Do not talk an Atheist, Sir. Fate had nothing to do with it. You didn't want to hurt the Russians—nothing of the kind. You wanted to hurt me, and to spoil my reputation with the people of England. And so you sent me with big ships to shallow waters, and wished me to get the ships knocked to smash against stone walls, and would not. That's the coat, Sir, as the Irish say; and Fate had no more to do with it than my—my cocked hat.

Sir James (smiling)—Ah! cocked hat. A happy illustration. The very one, I recollect, which you used so amusingly after our delightful dinner in Pall mall. It was into a cocked hat that you were so good as to say you intended to knock Cronstadt.

Sir Charles—Never said anything of the kind.

Sir James—My dear friend, you do yourself injustice. You will next tell me that you did not offer that spirited alternative between St. Petersburg and another quarter, as the locality you would visit in six weeks from the time of sailing.

Sir Charles—If every fellow's speeches, after he is shipped his grog, are to be overhauled against him, I don't know that you would come off particularly well, my Lord. Now, what are you going to do for me; that is what I want to know.

Sir James (pleasingly) Well, my dear Admiral, you have so completely done for yourself that I hardly see what there is left to us.

Sir Charles—None of your scoffs, I tell you, Sir. I'll let the country know all about you. Hang me if I don't throw myself upon the country, Sir. Everybody knows that a Napier can do everything—and that on sea, on shore, in politics, and everywhere else, a Napier is infallible. You know that, I suppose, Sir?

Sir James—The public is aware of the fact, Sir Charles, from repeated advertisements to that effect, emanating from those who ought to be best informed on the subject.

Sir Charles—Yes, Sir; and if you had given me the proper means to attack Emperor Nicholas would at this moment have been scratching a bear with his toothpick on the plaster of the Tower. Do you hear that, Sir—a bear, Sir.

Sir James (assentingly)—I hear a bear, Admiral. Did you ever hear an old canny proverb about a bad workman always finding fault with his tools? Not that it has anything to do with our present business; Indeed, I hardly know what has.

Sir Charles—I'll expose you—I'll skin you—I'll scarify you! I'll blow you out of water, Sir.

Sir James (meekly)—As you did Cronstadt, Admiral?

Sir Charles—I'm going to dine with Moon, the Mayor, in a few days, and see if I don't have it all out.

Sir James (smiling) Well, he is a Conservator of the River Thames, so you'll brothers in arms. You can tell him how you went swan hopping in the Baltic ha! ha! (Exit Sir Charles furiously.)

FECUNDITY.—The possible produce of one pair of pigeons in four years has been estimated at 14,760; of one pair of rabbits at not less than 274,840.

☞ Life is like a flower, which is no sooner blown than it begins to wither.

REST OF THE SABBATH.

The North British Review illustrates the importance of sufficient sleep, on a parallel with the history of the Sabbath:

"The Creator has given us a natural restorative—sleep;—and a moral restorative—Sabbath-keeping; and it is ruin to dispense with either. Under the pressure of high excitement, individuals have passed weeks together with little sleep or none; but when the process is long continued, the over driven powers rebel, and fever, delirium, and death come on. Nor can the natural amount be systematically curtailed without corresponding mischief. The Sabbath does not arrive like sleep. The day of rest does not steal over us like the day of slumber. It does not entrance us almost whether we will or not; but, addressing us as intelligent beings, our Creator assures us that we need it, and bids us notice in return, and court its renovation. And if, going in the face of the Creator's kindness, we force ourselves to work all days alike it is not long till we pay the forfeit. The mental worker—the man of business, or the man of letters—finds his ideas coming turbid and slow; the equipoise of his faculties is upset, he grows moody, fitful, and capricious; and with his mental elasticity broken shouldiny disaster occur, he subsides into habitual melancholy, or in self destruction speeds his guilty exit from a gloomy world. And the manual worker—the artisan, the engineer, by toiling on from day to day, and week to week, the bright intitution of his eyes gets blunted; and forgetful of their cunning, his fingers no longer perform their feats of twinkling agility, nor by a plastic touch mould dead matter, or wield mechanic power; but mingling his life's blood in his daily drudgery, his locks are prematurely grey, his genial humour sours, and slave it till he has become a morose or reckless man, for an extra effort, or any blink of balmy feelings, he must stand indebted to opium or alcohol."

FRENCH TRIBUTE TO ENGLISH FORTITUDE.

A letter from the East received in Paris contains the following:—As I am speaking to you of our brave Allies, I cannot omit giving you some details of an incident which produced here some disquietude, and on which many comments were made by evil disposed persons. An English regiment had, it is said, laid down its colours, (déposa son drapeau.) You will at once understand the effect produced here by such intelligence, and you will be at no loss to guess the numerous interpretations it gave rise to. This, however, is what really occurred:—A regiment encamped, it is said at Balaclava, had been so cut up by sickness, that, seeing its ranks reduced to a point when all military rule was lost, it was resolved to carry back its colours to Constantinople until such time as the regiment could be reorganized and receive recruits from England. Such is the simple fact which has been exaggerated and misstated by ill minded persons. Though our allies have unfortunately suffered a great deal, they have constantly proved by their energetic attitude before the enemy, what honour and patriotism can do, and you may rest assured that they have never ceased to be worthy of the great nation to which they belong.

AMERICAN BALLOON DUEL.—A French paper gives, on the authority of a correspondent, an account of a duel that took place in Yankee land, at a place called Wagtown, between an abolitionist and a slave-owner. To prevent interference, it was arranged that the mortal combat should not come off on lower earth, but in the clouds, each party having a balloon of his own. Being so sorted of course they made their own gas. The arms were equally well chosen; one night, Johnny Breemin, had a dozen swivels, the other, Heffry Allright, the bigger holder, took up a howitzer.—A long account of the successive broadsides, and the skill of the duellists in evading the shot by the throwing out of ballast or emptying gas, dodging up and down, east and west, we will skip and come to the result. After four hour's cannonading a bomb, from Heffrey's howitzer, burst Johnny's balloon, but at the same moment Johnny passed over his adversary's machine, and by a simultaneous discharge of his twelve swivels, shattered Allright into the air. A few seconds afterwards two mangled corpses were picked up.

SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.—What a cheerful, happy, self congratulating old maid was lost when Fanny became a wife. Only read this extract:—

"All articles of gentlemen's wearing apparel made—to order."

"Saints and angels! only think of that! Well, I thank a kind Providence I never was married. No tyrannical frock coats, or "dress coats," or Petersham, profane my closets. No vests, or socks, or dickies crowd my nice laces, and ribbons, and muslins. No bearing cane keeps company with my silken parasolette. No lumbering great boots tread on the toes of my little slippers and gaiters. Nobody kicks my spinster foot under the table to stop me in the middle of a sentence that I'm bent upon finishing. Nothing on the wide earth that's 'made to order,' finds admittance into my single-blessed territories. I should be all teeth and claws if there did!"—Fanny Fern

PARTICULAR OF CHURCH.—"Why can't you do as our lathe's used to do?" said a good old deacon to the pastor of one of our country churches. The pastor had been preaching for the church through the year, once a month, for which they agreed to give about seventy dollars. His church was out, and the church was about to call him for another year. "How do you mean?" said the preacher. "Why preach on charity; and let nothing be said about salary or money, any way; let each one give what he feels like giving, without letting the right hand know what the left hand doeth. That is what I call preaching on charity; it's the way our lathers did, and the preachers were supported well." The pastor agreed to it. The year passed on. At the close he found he had received one dollar and seventy-five cents for his years labor; a sum which he had twice five hundred times. This was what he called teaching on charity; and the members let hands never know what the right hand did.—Western Recorder.

PAT'S DREAM.—A son of the Emerald Isle was observed by a friend one morning to look exceedingly blank and perplexed, and he inquired of him what ailed him? Pat said he had had a dream. His friend interrogated him as to whether it was a good or bad dream? Pat answered, "it was a little of both. Faith I'll tell you: I dreamed I was with the Pope, who was as great a jintleman as any one in the district and he axed me wud I drink? Thinks I wud a duck swim, and seeing the Innishowen, and legions, and sugar, on the sideboard, I told him I didn't care if I took a wee drop of punch! 'Cowd or hot?' axed the Pope. 'Hot, yer holiness,' I replied, and wil that he stepped down to the kitchen for the biling water, but before he got back I woke straight up! I know it's distressing me I didn't take it cold."

PAYMENTS OF CHURCH.—"Why can't you do as our lathe's used to do?" said a good old deacon to the pastor of one of our country churches. The pastor had been preaching for the church through the year, once a month, for which they agreed to give about seventy dollars. His church was out, and the church was about to call him for another year. "How do you mean?" said the preacher. "Why preach on charity; and let nothing be said about salary or money, any way; let each one give what he feels like giving, without letting the right hand know what the left hand doeth. That is what I call preaching on charity; it's the way our fathers did, and the preachers were supported well." The pastor agreed to it. The year passed on. At the close he found he had received one dollar and seventy-five cents for his years labor; a sum which he had twice five hundred times. This was what he called teaching on charity; and the members let hands never know what the right hand did.—Western Recorder.

PAT'S DREAM.—A son of the Emerald Isle was observed by a friend one morning to look exceedingly blank and perplexed, and he inquired of him what ailed him? Pat said he had had a dream. His friend interrogated him as to whether it was a good or bad dream? Pat answered, "it was a little of both. Faith I'll tell you: I dreamed I was with the Pope, who was as great a jintleman as any one in the district and he axed me wud I drink? Thinks I wud a duck swim, and seeing the Innishowen, and legions, and sugar, on the sideboard, I told him I didn't care if I took a wee drop of punch! 'Cowd or hot?' axed the Pope. 'Hot, yer holiness,' I replied, and wil that he stepped down to the kitchen for the biling water, but before he got back I woke straight up! I know it's distressing me I didn't take it cold."

THE IDENTITY OF ROME AND BABYLON.

THE POPE THE LINEAL REPRESENTATIVE OF BELSHAZZAR—THE NAME OF THE BEAST AND THE NUMBER OF HIS NAME.

(FOR THE BRITISH MESSENGER.)

The glory of Christ is intimately connected with the exposure of the blasphemous pretensions of antichrist. Every one, whose heart beats true to the rightful King, must rejoice in whatever tends to confound the claims of the usurper. We have already seen much that goes to establish the wonderful identity between Rome and Babylon. But the evidence on that head is still more direct and conclusive than any that has yet come before us. I have now to prove that the Pope is the true and legitimate living representative of Belshazzar, the last Chaldean pontiff king of Babylon, and that to him, as such, belong both the name and number of the ten-horned beast of the Apocalypse.

In common with all the earth, Rome, at a very early prehistoric period, had drunk deep of Babylon's "golden cup." But above and beyond all other nations, it has had, and has, a connection with the idolatry of Babylon, that puts it in a position peculiar and alone. Long before the days of Romulus, a representative of the Babylonian Messiah, called by his name, had fixed his temple as a god, and his palace as a king, on the very spot where Romus and his brother afterwards founded their city.* Some revolution had then taken place; the graven images of Babylon had been shelished; the worship of any idol had been sternly prohibited;† and when the twin founders of the new world-renowned city reared its humble walls, the city and the palace of their Babylonian predecessor had long lain in ruins. The deadly wound, however, thus given to the Chaldean system, was destined to be healed. A colony of Lydians, devotedly attached to the worship of the Chaldean Madonna and Bersonn, had migrated from Asia Minor, and settled in the immediate neighbourhood of Rome. They were incorporated in the Roman state, and their "sovereign pontiff," through his superior skill in science and astronomy, soon gained such influence, as to be elected, even so early as the time of Numa, "sovereign pontiff" of the Roman people. As "king of the ages," director of all festivals, and supreme authority in all religious questions, "the sovereign pontiff wielded immense power over the minds of men, and, by little and little, moulded them so effectually, as to bring the Romans back again to much of the idolatry which they formerly repudiated and spurned."‡

Still the Etrurian pontiff of Rome was only an offshoot from the grand original Babylonian system. He was a devoted worshipper of the Babylonian god; but he was not the legitimate representative of that god. The true legitimate Babylonian pontiff had his seat beyond the bounds of the Roman empire. That seat, after the death of Belshazzar, and the expulsion of the Chaldean priesthood from Babylon, by the Medo-Persian kings, was at Pergamos, where afterwards was one of the seven churches of Asia.§ There, in consequence, for many centuries, was "Satan's seat" (Rev. ii.)—There was his favourite abode, there was the worship of the Babylonian goddess and her son celebrated with frantic orgies and excesses, that elsewhere were seldom witnessed. Tho' at first the Roman pontiff had no immediate connection with Pergamos and the hierarchy there, yet in course of time the pontificate of Rome and the pontificate of Pergamos came to be identified.—Pergamos itself became part and parcel of the Roman empire; and, of course, when the Roman emperor was made "Pontifex Maximus," head of Roman religion, as well as head of the Roman state, all the powers and functions of the true legitimate Babylonian pontiff, were supremely vested in him. Then, on certain occasions, he officiated in all the pomp of the Babylonian pontifical costume, as Belshazzar himself might have done, in robes of scarlet, wearing the mitre of Dagon, and bearing the keys of Janus and Cybele. Thus did matters continue, even under so-called Christian emperors, who, as a salve to their consciences, appointed a heathen as their substitute, in the performance of the mere directly idolatrous functions of the pontificate, till the reign of Gratian, who, as shown by Gibbon, was the first that refused to be arrayed in the idolatrous pontifical attire,§ and to perform any part of the pontifical functions, caused great clamours throughout the empire. The result was, the emperor resigned the pontificate, and the Bishop of Rome was appointed in his stead.‖ This was A.D. 378. Then did Pope Damasus, a professed minister of Jesus Christ, the true Messiah, become the recognized head of the idolatrous system of Tammuz, the false Messiah of Babylon. Thenceforth all questions affecting Pagan worship, which, though disestablished, was still tolerated in the city of Rome, were decided by him. By authority from him was Pagan worship celebrated, and that to an extent, as shown by Zosimus, subversive of the very civil laws of the empire.¶ Then the Bishop of Rome put on what the Emperor of Rome, under force of conscience, had cast off, the Babylonian costume, in which he is now arrayed when he celebrates pontifical high mass at St. Peter's. Thus did the Pope appear the very image of Janus, "the double-faced," whose chief functionary he became. For the Christians he had one face, for the initiated Pagans another. To-day he officiates as the servant of Christ, to-morrow as the high-priest of his rival. Is this he at the mystery of iniquity, what is there that can be?

Now, just as it was foretold by Paul in regard to the "revelation" of the Man of Sin, so did it come to pass. "The mystery of iniquity doth already work, only he who now letteth will let until he be taken out of the way; and then shall that Wicked be revealed." These words show that the let, or hinderance to the manifestation of the Man of Sin, existed in the apostle's day; and they show also that as soon as the let was removed, "that Wicked" should stand forth plainly revealed before the eyes of men. The word is he then, at that very time, at that precise period.—Now, can there be a doubt, with the facts before us, what was the "let" to which the apostle referred? The early Christians themselves believed that that let was the Roman emperor. But the question is, in what capacity? I think that, viewing all the circumstances of the case, we are shut up to the conclusion, that it was in his capacity of Pontifex Maximus. The Man of Sin, according to the divine prediction, was to be a minister of Christ, a spiritual officer, as is plain from this, among other things, that the name of Judas Iscariot, "the son of perdition," is applied to him.—Now, so long as the emperor had the pontificate, it was impossible that any minister of Christ should do what it was predicted of the Man of Sin that he should do. But as soon as the emperor resigned the pontificate, the false apostle, the traitor, is "revealed" at once. Before that he had been working in the dark; then his treason was brought into the light of day. The vast mass of the nominal Christians at Rome did not see the traitorous character of the deed of their bishop, when he became high priest of the Chaldean queen of heaven and her son. But that was simply because for their own apostacy they were judicially blinded. The elect knew the facts of the case, who had the unction of the Holy One, and were possessed of spiritual discernment, saw clearly the wickedness of the step which was taken. Then did the Waldenses break off all communion with the Roman church. Then was Jovinian excommunicated, and subjected to more than spiritual pains and penal
