querors, are the avenging scourge, which Divine Providence frequently employs for his inscrutable designs.

Of what consequence is it, that Spain should now suffer all the horrors of a most sanguinary war? Of what consequence the poll-shou of a few fortified towns or provinces? The eternal hatted, which the accumulation of injuries has rendered sacred; that hatted to tyranny which has produced efforts, of which the present generation was thought incapable; this natural hatted, a necessary element in every Spaniard, although it may for some moments appear subdited, will distuse itself every day more extensively; will pass from bosom to bosom, from generation to generation; and whenever it finds an opportunity, to bust as under the bonds which confine it, will proclaim itself in blood, ruin and desolation.

Not can it be otherwise, when we consider the Spanish

Nor can it be otherwise, when we consider the Spanish character, and the splendor and honor which it has displayed to the world, from the earliest records of their lamentable revolutions. But there is one principal reason, which will now render the effects of this hatred more dreadful, more temble and destructive, than at any former period of its greatell fury.

Pollelling more ferocity, though less policy than the Saracens, the French have not only the common rage for conquell, but also for legislation, which no nation ever toletated in a foreign usurper. The Moors being satisfied with keeping possetsion of our country, and exacting a small inbute, lest to our forefathers the free exercise of their religion, attachment to their laws, and adherence to their cuftoms; and to this toleration they were indebted for the prolongation of their dominion. The present tyrant, refining upon torture, more than all the tyrants of antiquity, with his (word in one hand, and in the other that black code, by which he pretends to make all his crimes lawful, fearcely takes possession of a country, but he subjects it to his tyrannical laws; more cruel than those of Draco; more ridiculous than those of the infatuated Emperors of Roman depravity; laws, which did they contain the wildom of the universe, would be deteltable from the very name which heads them -from the dreadful chain of crimes, which their promulgation produced in France; from the feries of iniquities, which has accompanied their extension to other nations who flood in need, neither of information, nor laws, nor legislators; but dellable, above all, from the internal conviction and mournful experience, that the codes of tyrants are ever void and illusory; fince caprice is their law; fire and sword their authority; interest and passion their policy, as Bonaparte himfelf has declared,

That shadow of a King pretends, that he is introducing reformations, that he will cenfer benefits, and that his infamous government will secure public happiness. These are specious pretexts, employed to sooth and seduce, but which being frequently practised and well known, will never impose upon true Spaniards. Soon would the contradiction appear in their actions; in the fury and infesseable despotism of petty tyrants, the zealous imitators of their master; in their insatiable rapine; in the vices of their low condition, and of a life given up to debauchery and impiety; soon would it be manifest in every thing, which naturally slows from the phrenzy of passion and disorder erected upon the corruption of public morals; in every thing, which, more than slavery itself, is abhorrent to the religious and reserved disposition of a nation, renowned for piety and a nice sense of honour.

Away; away then, with the odious picture of Spain, willingly submitting to the most detestable and odious yoke, which was ever intended to be imposed upon her losty neck. Slaves, and those who have the hearts of slaves, may figure to themselves this subjection. But we will never believe it until we hear the will of the nation, freely expressed in every quarter of the penintula, unrestrained by French influence, and spontaneously confirmed, in full council, by the assembled Cortes.

There are now degenerate Spaniards, as there formerly have been, and always will be. To them the former conquerors were indebted for a confiderable, if not the greatest part of their successes. To them also the modern Vandals owe those temporary possessions, which would make them blush, if they were not wholly insensible to shame. The sun has spots upon his resulgent disk; but the great mass of the nation is pure and honourable; diffused throughout two worlds, her character will ever be the same; the same her actions, and uniform her productions, wherever she is free

If they should accidentally be subjected to this irresistable power, the suffering provinces will stifle their clamours. These which are free will sty to their affishance with sympathetic sorrow, and the contest will be eternal. The banner of patriotism will ever be hoisted, not in one place at a time, but in many: thus reducing those mercenary cohorts, and teviving the military glory of that people, who ever loved it from instinct; of those who at one time gave laws to Europe, and in the rotation of political events, might give them to it again.

But upon what means can Spain depend to sustain so unequal a contest, when even fortune appears to be averse to her, and when, extending her views over all continental Europe, she sees herself slanding alone, against the most enormous mass of military power that ages ever witnessed?

Spain will depend upon the juffice of her caute, known to the whole world, unequalled, and deferving of the protection of Heaven. She will depend upon her own efforts, her deeds of heroism, and dreadful instances of self devotion, which politerity will fearcely believe. She will depend upon an illustrious ally, united to her by indistoluble bonds; whose power and ability place in her hands perhaps the greatest balance of the folid splendor of empires. She will depend inccessively upon new allies, whenever any nation and opportunity to burft its barbarous chains. She will depend upon continual fuccours from her faithful and opulent breihren, the possetsors of the most valuable half of the glock. And lastly, the will depend upon the transitory existence of that base family, whose ambition all the thrones of the world would not fattate, and whose baseness and perhdy language has not terms to express.

Our religion teaches us, that the prosperity of the impious is but apparent; that the empire which is founded upon injustice cannot subsist. Can there be any thing more iniquitous than the usur pation of the crown of Spain, by a man both intignificant and despicable, an agent of the modern Tamerlane, and an accomplice in all his crimes?

SAINT JUHN, November 5, 1810.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.
On Tuesday Iast a Commission of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery was opened at Kingston in King's-County, at which His Honor Judge Chipman presided.

The Court was convened principally for the Trial of William Masculine, a Prisoner, charged with the Murder of Pregrine White.

A crowded audience listened, with great attention, to this very interesting trial.

It appeared that the deceased was a man quite in the vale of years, very trascible, abusive, and vindictive; and that the prisoner was in the prime of life, and had, for upwards of twenty years, fullained the fairell character for industry, for briety, and honefly, and poffeffed an obliging, mild disposition: That James Rogers, the Step-Father of the prisoner was also in the last stage of life, and also extremely abusive and vindictive; and that he and the deceased had for many years lived on farms adjoining each other, and had been conflandy at variance: That the quarrels which led to the fatal accident originated with thefe two abufive old men, about a dog belonging to Rogers, which, upon barking at the deceafed as he was passing, was lamed with a stone thrown at him: That a great deal of language grossly abusive passed between them in the hearing of the prisoner (then in Rogers' house) who was eventually induced to step out and to try to put a flop to the altercation, more especially as Rogers was much intoxicated with liquor: That upon his advising the deceased to go home and not remain there abusing an old drunken man, the deceased instantly, turned upon him with the most scurrilous and gross abuse, by both words and gestures, and not only upon him but also Mary Evans (the principal witness) to whom the prisoner was to have been married in a day or two: That the abufive language was retorted by the prisoner and Rogers, and continued for some minutes between the parties, till the deceased at length damned the prisoner and laid, if he had his gun he would blow the prifonce's brains out; upon which the prisoner faid " where is my piece," and inflantly ran into the house (at the distance of about four rods) and returned with it to the fence, upon the opposite side of which, in the road, the deceased was standing; who immediately recommenced his abusive irritatil g language and gestures-mimicking the prisoner (who was lame) by limping, and daring him to fire; upon which the prisoner discharged the gun at him, and nearly the whole of the load of that passed through his left leg between the knee and ankle: That the prisoner immediately returned to the house very much alarmed and distressed at the act he had committed, leaving the deceafed in the road, who was instantly attended to, in the kindest manner, by Mary Evans, notwithstanding the abuse to her intended husband: That the deceased languished from the 22d September, to the 3d October, when he expired.

It did not appear that the priloner intended to kill the deceased, but, as far as his intentions could be collected from all the circumstances, he meant to lame him only.

The feelings of the Jury (as well as the Court) appeared much interested for the unfortunate criminal, and had they consulted those only, their verdict, it is presumed, would have been manslaughter; but aided by a most excellent charge from the learned Judge, who pointed out to them in a clear, perspicuous manner their obligation to be guided by the Law, which he fully and satisfactorily explained to them, their seeings yielded to a sense of duty, and they returned their verdict (after an hour's deliberation) "Guilty" of wilful Murder."

The author of this note laments, that he has not the words of the Judge's address to the prisoner upon passing the awful Sentence; and that he finds himself wholly incompetent to do justice in giving an abstract of it—It was an address most tolemn and impressive, and delivered by him, under the most painful sensations.

At this Court was tried an Indictment found at the last Circuit against Benjamin Baxter for a misdemeanor, in forging an order on the House of J. Black, & Co.—The Defendant was convicted upon the most satisfactory evidence of the truth of the charge. It appeared that after obtaining an order from one Andrew M. Vey for 18s. 6d. payable in goods, the Defendant had altered it, by intering the words "ten pounds" thereby making it an order for $\int 10:18:6. which amount he had received.

He was tentenced to pay a fine of fifty pounds, to be imprisoned in the common Gaol for three months, at the expiration of which term, to fland in the Pillory for one hour; then to find security in £ 200 for his good behaviour for two years, and to stand committed until the whole was performed.

An Indicament was preferred to the Grand Jury, at this Court, against James Innes for an offence against the Marriage Act of this Province, in solemnizing Marriage between Farquhar M'Kenzie and Margaret Pack without legal authority, and returned by them a true bill. The Defendant was not present and process was issued against him,

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT!

The Public, as well as the family and friends of the deceased, have to lament the melancholy accident which has inatched from us one of our best and most ingenious mechanics, and a most valuable member of fociety, in the death of Mr. JOHN VENNING of this City; who while at work at the Steeple of the Church on the roof last Friday, by some means lost his foot hold and fell upon a bed of rocks below and instantly expired!!

During a few years residence in this City, Mr. Vannino acquired many friends, and (what can be said of but few) had not one enemy. His remains were carried yesterday afternoon into the Methodist Chapel, and from thence to the grave, attended by a great concourse of respectable inhabitants of different persuasion, all of whom joined in deploring the sad catastrophe. He was an Englishman and in the forty-seventh year of his age.

DIED] At Fredericton, on Monday the 22d ult. after a tedious and painful illness, the Rev. Mr. JAMES ALEX-ANDER, Methodist Missionary.

- On Friday last, in this City, Mr. JOHN M'KEE.
