Poetry.

NOT VERY FAR.

BY J. W. BAKKER.

God is not far away,—they err,
Who heavenward look among the stars,
And gleaming thro' the ethereal bars
See God alone, or who prefer
To fix his crystal throne of light
Beyond this world of woe and sin,
And shut the radiant glories in
Forever from this realm of night,
And, towering in that world of bliss,
Its glories seldom shine in this.

When o'er the azure plains on high,
The chariot wheels of thunder roll,
And, piercing thro' the human soul
The fiery pointed lightnings fly;
Where waters dark, in torrents wild,
O'er rocky steeps, and deck and shrill,
They startle meadow-land and hill,
With mighty voice, fair nature's child
Is taught that this is God, and bows
With humble, reverential vows.

The mighty ocean, stretching round
The ponderous earth, whose billows roll
From shore to shore, from pole to pole,
Speaks in a language, most profound,
Of the Great God, at whose command
The stars came out, and world on world
On His blue banner were unfurled,
The work of His Almighty Hand;—
In burning lines, we plainly see
Thy glory, thy Divinity.

Yes, every star that lights the deep,
Sings of His glory,—field and wood,
The grand retreats of solitude:
The whirlwind in its mighty sweep,
The towering mountain, round whose feet,
Eternal Summer nods and blooms,
And gives the air its rich perfumes,
While Winter chills its skyborn peak,—
All these, in swelling notes, proclaim,
The grandeur of His wondrous name.

Yet he is near, else when the snare
Is spread to take my wayward feet,
And on life's current, strangely fleet,
I cannot see where breakers are,
What hand can guide, what power control?
Amid the shadows and the night,
What voice can ever point the sight,
And lead the longing of the soul.
But the dear Presence, ever near
In all our ways and wanderings here?

Yes very near, not far away,
Else why at morn and eventide,
This gracious Presence, near my side?
And thro' the night and thro' the day,
This loving Heart so near to mine,
And as the sweet communions blend,
I speak to him as friend to friend,
And know the Presence is divine,—
Not in the depths or lights above,
Far from the children of his love.

Miscellaneous.

TOM'S CAPITAL JOKE.

Tom Devon had just thought of such a capital joke. The treasurer was passing round the contribution box in Sunday School, when the good joke came into Tom's mind, and the joke was to drop a counterfeit bill into the box. Tom's father, the night before, had taken a bad fifty cent bill from his pocket, saying, "There, I must throw that away. If I am not careful, I shall pass it on some one who cannot afford to lose fifty cents as well as I can." But Tom had picked up the money and kept it. He had shown it to the boys in his class, not letting them have a very good look at it, lest some of them should detect the cheat. As Tom's father sometimes gave his son considerable money to put into the box, the boys did not take much notice when Tom put in, except when he said, "That was my money," the boy next to him made a face, and said, "Oh!" as if he did not believe a word of it. Just then the bell rang to close school, and nothing more was said about it.

Mr. Barnes, the treasurer, as he was going home late after school, took the contribution money and put it into his pocket. Happening to want some small change, he took some from the envelope of Sunday school money, and put a bill in its place, used the change he wanted, and putting the rest in his vest pocket. One of the small bills he took out was Tom's counterfeit fifty cents. It remained undisturbed for a couple of days. One afternoon, about dusk, as he was visiting a poor woman in a rickety tenement-house, she told him of a poor family in great want down stairs. The oldest child was a boy about eleven years old, just about Tom's age, but he was not so large. Mr. Barnes gave him Tom's fifty cent piece, and told him to get some wood for a fire, and some supper. Little Will picked up his ragged cap, and buttoned his ragged jacket closer round him, and ran out into the cold night. His bare feet were chilled by the cold stones, and the night wind whistled through his jacket, but he held the money tightly in his hand, and ran to the baker's. There was a new man there, and poor Will, shivering with the cold, held out the money and asked for some bread. The baker shoved two loaves toward him, and took the money. He handed it right back, saying:

"That's bad, give me something else."

"That's all I have," said Will.

"Give me back that bread, then," said the man roughly. "I believe that you knew the bill was counterfeit."

"Indeed, I do not," began Will, but the man stopped him, saying, "Come, be off." As Will opened the door to go, he added, "take care of your counterfeit money."

A policeman standing near heard the last remark, and followed Will down the street as the boy walked off. Will did not notice the policeman; he was saying to himself, "That gentleman couldn't have given me bad money: I'll try at another place." Here he was refused, and went, almost in despair, into a grocery store. The policeman, who had followed him, entered, and in spite of the child's crying took him off to the station-house for trying to pass bad money.

"A gentleman gave it to me," said Will.

"I've no doubt of it," answered the policeman. "I guess you know more about it than you pretend to."

Meanwhile Willie's sick mother and little brothers and sisters waited for him. He did not come. An hour passed, then two, and no Will. By-and-by they heard a man's step on the stairs, and when they opened the door, there stood Mr. Barnes, with some food and clothes for them. Instead of the happy faces that he hoped to see around a little fire, they sat in the dark, and the little ones had cried themselves to sleep on the floor.

Bad news travels fast. It did not take Mr. Barnes long to find what had become of poor Will. While the children warmed themselves by a bright fire, and ate the supper Mr. Barnes had brought them, he went to the station house to find Will. He tried to think, as he went, how Will could have got counterfeit money, and finally, concluded that it must have been some of the Sunday school money.

Poor Will had to stay all night in the station house. In the cell that was next to the one he was locked up in was a drunken man, who swore and shouted and sang drunken songs till towards morning. There were others, thieves and drunken men, that Will was taken into Court with, but Mr. Barnes was there, and got him liberated immediately. It was not very pleasant for Will to hear a great ugly boy that lived in the same house with him call out in the street: "Why, Will, how long have you been out of jail?"

Next Sunday Mr. Barnes told the superintendent of the Sunday school that he wanted to speak to the boys. "Boys," said he, "there was a large piece of money put into the box last Sunday; can you tell me who put it in?" Tom did not feel inclined to tell but one of the boys near him, who thought it very nice that one of their class should have given so much, answered, "Tom Devon."

"Stand up, Tom," said Mr. Barnes.

"Did you put fifty cents in the box last Sunday?"

"Yes, sir."

"Was it a good bill?"

"I only put it in for fun," said Tom; "the other boys put in buttons some times."

Then Mr. Barnes told the whole story.

How would any of you have liked to be in Tom's place?—Fanny Elkins, in the Christian Union.

THE GREEN SPOT.

The late Noah Winslow was fond of telling the following incident of his mercantile life, and he never closed the narration but with swimming eyes:

"During the financial crisis and crash of '57, when heavy men were sinking all around us, and banks were tottering, our house became alarmed in view of the condition of its own affairs.

The partners—three of us, of whom I was the senior—met in our private office for consultation. Our junior had made a careful inventory of everything—of his bills receivable and bills payable, and his report was, that twenty thousand dollars of ready money, to be held through the pressure, would save us. Without that we must go by the board—the result was inevitable. I went out upon the street, and among my friends, but in vain.

Two whole days I strove, and begged, and then returned to the counting house in despair. I sat at my desk, expecting every moment to hear our junior sounding the terrible words, 'Our paper is protested!' when a gentleman entered my department unannounced. I could not locate him nor call him to my mind any way.

'Mr. Winslow,' he said, taking a seat at the end of my desk, 'I hear you are in need of money.'

The very face of the man inspired me with confidence, and I told him how I was situated.

'Make your individual note for one year, without interest, for twenty thousand dollars, and I will give you a check, payable in gold, for that amount.'

While I sat gazing upon him in speechless astonishment, he continued:

'You don't remember me; but I remember you. I remember when you were a member of the Superintending School Committee of Bradford. I was a boy in the village school. My father was dead; my mother was poor; and I was but a shabbily dressed child, though clean. When our class came out on examination day, you asked the questions. I fancied that you would praise and pet the children of rich and fortunate parents, and pass me by.

'But it was not as I thought. In the end you passed by all the others, and came to me. You laid your hand on my head, and told me I did very well; and then you told me I could do better still if I would try. You told me the way to honor and renown were open to all alike, no one had a free pass. All I had to do was to be resolved and push on. That, sir, was the turning point of my life. From that hour my soul has aspired, and I have never reached a great good without blessing you in my heart. I have prospered, and am wealthy; and now I offer you but a poor return for the soul wealth you gave me in that by-gone time.'

'I took the check,' said Winslow, 'and drew the gold; and our house was saved. And where, at the end of the year,' he added, 'do you suppose I found my note? In possession,' he said, with streaming eyes, 'of my little orphaned grandaughter! Oh, hearts like that man's are what bring earth and heaven nearer together!'"

THE FAMILY BEAR.

A DECLAMATION FOR A GIRL.

The tale I am now about to tell,
Is a tale of something that once befell
The son of a man, who went to dwell
Away from his friends and neighbors;
He didn't exactly go to the dogs,
He built him a cabin of mud logs,
With nobody near him but wolves and frogs,
To make remarks on his labors.

A stern and an upright man was he;
His wife was comely and fair to see;
His sons were nine and his daughters three,
Like the Muses and the Graces;
But lest their beauty should prove a snare,
He gave them the coarest clothes to wear;
He taught them 'twas folly to dress their hair,
And he never would have a mirror there
To make them proud of their faces.

But once on a time, as the stories say,
When he went to the city his tax to pay,
And lay in a store for many a day
Of the family salt and spices;
In the top of his trunk with the greatest of care,
He placed a mirror, shining and square,
And bade the family all beware,
He would have no meddling fingers there,
For he wouldn't encourage their vices.

No doubt it was evil blood, that ran
Clear back to the time the world began,
When Eve, our mother, first tempted man.
But this there is no denying;
In spite of his threat, it came pass
That the youngest son of his love, alas!
Peeped into the trunk, and into the glass,
Then fell to shrieking and crying!

For out of the trunk looked up to him
A grimy face, with a senseless grin,
'Twas a very natural error.
"Oh, mother! as sure as you are standing there
My father has brought home a live young bear!
An ugly fellow all over hair.
I am nearly dead with terror!"

MORAL.

I think the moral of this must be,
If you would'nt get scared as bad as he,
Whenever you chance your face to see,
Don't let your lessons in neatness be
Until you are one-and-twenty;
I'm sure I would rather see a bear
Than a boy with tangled and tumbled hair,
And dirty fingers the worse for wear,
When water and soap are plenty!

—Mrs. E. H. Miller, in School Festival.

DIED FROM TIGHT LACING.—A girl in Chester Vt., died a few days ago from the effects of tight lacing. To such a fearful extent had this been indulged in, that the ribs were found lapped over one another, and the breast bone was passed over one lung so that she had entirely lost its use. For several months previous to her death, this poor victim had been obliged to sleep with corsets on and tightened to the last notch; for the loosening gave such pain in the internal expansion that she could not bear it.
