Poetry.

ON THE DEATH OF A LITTLE DAUGHTER.

Our Father sent an angel child
Within our home to dwell;
Of all her gentle, winning ways,
How weak are words to tell!
Her beaming eyes and tender glance
Oft filled my soul with joy:
She was my idol and my pride,
Though well I loved my boy.

And often on my fevered brow
Her tiny hands were pressed,
And many loving arts essayed
To bring "sweet mother" rest.
And! now, alas! I miss the clasp
Of that small dimpled arm,
But well I know my loved one's safe
From future care or harm.

The footsteps of my darling were
Sweet music to my ear;
In dreams I start, and fondly dream
I still their echoes hear;
I faintly strive to catch the sound
Of infant laughter wild;
With yearning heart my arms outstretch
To clasp once more my child.

Oh! who can tell the bitter pain,
The pang it cost to part.
What mingled memories haunt the brain
And rend my lonely heart!
At every step some trace I meet
Of her I've loved and lost;
Each passing hour renews the grief
By which my soul is tossed.

Ah, me! the little stocking lies
Beside the empty shoe:
Her useless playthings now recall
The joys that once I knew.
Oh! let me weep, and do not strive
To check a mother's tears;
My brimming eyes can pierce beyond
Where hope's bright bow appears.

I would not—though my heart is wrung
By selfish grief the while—
I would not dim one joy of hers,
My suffering to beguile.
Then do not chide me though I weep,
Nor strive to check my tears,
Though earth seems now less fair to me,
Yet heaven more bright appears.

THE STORY OF THE WAR IN FRANCE.

TOLD IN WORDS OF ONE SYLLABLE FOR YOUNG READERS.

In the land of France, which is a long way off from us, a great war has now gone on for five months. Do you wish to know why this war broke out, who made it, and, what it all means. If you do, then read what is to come. But first let me tell you what the land is in which this sad war is fought.

France is a land which was once full of sun and joy, and its sons were proud of it. Eight months in each year it was bright with the rich hues of grapes, some of which were red and some white; and from these grapes fine wines were made for all the world to drink.

You all knew of France, too, as a place from which came the toys and dolls which were so queer and so nice, for some of them spoke words, and could roll their eyes, and go to sleep; and some could jump out of a box, and fall flat when you put the lid of the box down on top of them. But you can have no more of these till this war ends.

There is no one now who knows how to make them. All the men who knew how to do it are in the war.

This land of France, once so gay, would have been gay now if a bad King had not borne rule there. This King, who did not know what it was to be a good man, one day said he would make war with the King who was on a throne in the land of the Rhine, and he did so. Now, the King of the land of the Rhine had done no harm to the King of France, but when he heard that this man meant to make war with him, he said to his friends, "I will fight to the end if he comes here." So the war was sure to come, and come it did.

The King of France sent up to the land of the Rhine his men in arms, and his great guns and shot and shell, and long trains which had bread and food of all kinds on board, and told his men to slay and steal as much as they could. He went forth at the head of these men, and he and they meant to stay till they had got all they could hope to get on the Rhine, and out of those whose homes were there.

But bad men's plans once in a while go wrong in this world. When the French King came to a place where he could see the Rhine, he found a great force of men and of guns in his way, so that he could not go on as he meant to. There was then but one thing for him to do. He had to fight and fight he did. But the Rhine King was both too strong and too quick to be put down by his foe. So the great fight went on all day, and the next day, and the next, and each night the men who had fought all day lay down to rest on the fields that were wet with blood. At last, the French King was caught, and all the men who were with him were caught too; and the King who had made this war was shut up in a safe place where he could do no harm, and he is there now. His son, whom they call a Prince, and his wife, who is a Queen, have gone to a land where there is no war, and where they will be safe; but they have no home now, and no throne to sit on, and you may know by this that they are sad.

But the war did not end when the bad King had been put in a place where he at least could do no harm. Oh! no; for the more the King of the Rhine and his men fought the French, the more they felt as if they would like to go on, and on they went. One day, as they went on through France, they came to a stop at a great French fort, known as the fort of Metz, and said they would take that first. It cost much blood and a good deal of time to take it, but at last it fell. Then the men of the Rhine went on still through France, and fought the French all the way, and beat them. At last, the King of the land of the Rhine sat down once more to take a strong place, and this time the place was the Great Town in which the bad King had made his own home. The Rhine men found it was very hard to take this place, for it was so strong and great, but they still try to do it, and we shall not have to wait long to hear the news of what they mean to do.

All this time the French King ate and slept each day in the place where he had been left, while the Rhine King went to the bad King's house and made his own home there, and slept and ate his meals, and had a good time, for he was free, and the French King was not free. Great men, with stars on their breasts and swords by their side, went to see him in his might, and all the world rang with this queer news.

And all this time, too, the Rhine King's men kept up their fight, and cut up the streets of towns with shells, and sent hot shot through the roofs of houses, and went to take the towns of France in his rough way, till there was not a place in the land that was safe from them, and no one knew where they would go next. And we do not know this day what they will do, for they all say they will not stop.

Now, this war is very bad for all those who are in it. It has hurt the land of France more than it has hurt the land of the Rhine, but you must not think that the Rhine King's land is now so rich and grand as it once was. You know that when war comes, all things stop, but the troops and the guns, and so it is now. The shops in both these fair lands are shut, and there are no men to work. Homes are sad, and there is no joy nor sport; for men lie dead, whose eyes can no more look at sweet faces, and whose ears can no more hear the dear tones of wife or child. No laugh is now heard in the good old homes, and no bread nor meat is free of the tears that fall.

And this is not all, for bread is scarce in the Great Town where the bad King had his home, and the flesh of cats and dogs and rats and mice, or of the horse, is all that some have to eat. Men starve and die when there is no food for them.

Each child should know what war means. These things that I have told you show you what it is. It is as bad as it can be, you see. It means death and woe, no homes, and no bread to eat. You will hear all about the rest of the war, or will read the news of it; but while you hear or read, do not fail dear child, to thank your God that your home is in a land where there is no war, and where no hot from great guns can hurt those who love you, or stop you in your play. War is bad, but peace is good; and there is no peace so full of joy as that you now have, for it is the peace of home and friends. Be sure you think of this when you hear your friends at home talk of the men who still kill or hurt their foes, far off on the shore of the great sea, in the land that was once the land of the sun.—Methodist.

WHICH WAS THE BRAVE?

Two young men joined a ship one day. Their names were Ellis and Jones.

Now Ellis loved his Bible, while Jones made all manner of sport of religion. The first evening shortly after supper Ellis took out his Bible and began to read. Jones laughed at him and called him a milk-sop, and tried to snatch away his Bible. But Ellis hung on to the blessed book in spite of the jeers of the young sailor and his other wicked mates.

One dark night, not long after, there came a sudden gale, which carried away the ship's main top gallant-yard. The spar hung by the rigging, and lashed about so furiously as to threaten to carry away the topmast itself. It was a fearful task, almost certain death, to mount the rigging, and try to cut away the spar. Who would do it? The captain called for a volunteer, and seeing Jones standing near, said:

"Come, my man, there's work for you. I heard you boasting of your manhood the other day."

But then Ellis, the Bible reader, stepped forward, and offered to go aloft.

"No," said the captain, "I have made the offer to Jones."

But Jones shook his head, and after looking aloft, said, "I dare not, sir. The man who attempts it is sure to lose his life."

"I will go," said Ellis, who had by this time fastened a hatchet to his belt.

The next moment the brave fellow was in the rigging, and lost in the darkness. For several minutes nothing could be seen of him from the deck. The men held their breath with anxiety for his safety. Presently something was heard to fall. Was it Ellis? No. It was the spar cleared of the rackling. The men shouted. A minute later and Ellis stood safely on the deck.

"Thank you, Ellis," said the captain; "you did that work nobly. I think no man will venture to call you a milk sop, or laugh at your Bible reading after this."

Then after sending the watch aloft to shorten sail, the captain turned again to Ellis, and asked:

"How did you feel while you were aloft, Ellis?"

"That I was in the hands of God, sir. I prayed for his protection, and I never felt my heart more light, nor my courage more firm."

What a noble answer! What a proof that God makes the hearts of his children brave! Boys, do you want to be bold, and do deeds of daring for the benefit of others? Behold the way! See it in the words of Ellis: "I prayed for his protection, and I never felt my heart more light, or my courage more firm."—Mother's Magazine.

THE SOLDIER AND THE THISTLE.—Little Winnie in her eagerness after flowers, had wounded her hand on a sharp prickly thistle. This made her cry with pain at first, and past with vexation afterwards.

"I do wish there was no such thing as a thistle in the world," she said, pettishly.

"And yet the Scottish nation think so much of it, they engrave it on their national arms," said her mother.

"It is the last flower that I should pick out," said Winnie; "I am sure they might have found a great many nicer ones even among the weeds."

"But the thistle did them such good service once," said her mother; "they learned to esteem it very highly. One time the Danes invaded Scotland, and they prepared to make a night attack on a sleeping garrison. So they crept along barefooted as still as possible, until they were almost up to the spot. Just at that moment a barefooted soldier stepped on a great thistle, and the hurt made him utter a sharp, shrill cry of pain. The sound awoke the sleepers, and each man sprang to his arms. They fought with great bravery, and the intruders were driven back with much loss. So you see, the thistle saved Scotland; and ever since it has been placed on their seal as their national flower."

"WHERE DOES JESUS LIVE?"—To many people, the Saviour is very far—too far, indeed, to bless or help, or save in time of need. Others have a different experience, an experience of Christ with them and Christ in them.

"Where does Jesus live?" asked a missionary once, in a mission-school.

"Please, sir, he lives in our alley now," said a little boy who had lately found the Saviour.

Such an experience as this is sweet. To have Christ dwelling, not only in heavenly glory afar off, but also in our streets, in our alleys, in our homes, and in our hearts—this makes this dreary world look bright, and the world to come look brighter still.

"While blest with a sense of His love,
A palace a toy would appear;
And prisons would palaces prove,
If Jesus would dwell with me there."

Holy poverty is heavenly riches.
