Poetry.

USE ME.

Make use of me, my God!
Let me not be forgot;
A broken vessel cast aside—
One whom thou needest not.

I am thy creature, Lord,
And made by hands divine;
And I am part, however mean,
Of this great world of thine.

Thou usest all thy works—
The weakest things that be;
Each has a service of its own,
For all things wait on thee

Thou usest the high stars,
The tiny drops of dew,
The giant peak and little hill;
My God, O, use me too!

Thou usest tree and bower,
The rivers vast and small;
The eagles great, the little bird
That sings upon the wall.

Thou usest the wide sea,
The little hidden lake,
The pine upon the Alpine cliff,
The lily in the brake.

The huge rock in the vale.
The sand grain by the sea,
The thunder of the rolling cloud,
The murmur of the lea.

All things do serve thee here—
All creatures great and small;
Make use of me, my God,
The weakest of them all.

Miscellaneous.

PHILIP.

"Ma, where's my sled?"

"Little Tom Watters borrowed it this afternoon, to draw his sister over to Mrs. Brown's."

"Where are my nine-pins? They aren't in the closet."

"Bessie has company in the parlor, and I gave her permission to play with them."

"Well, where are my skates? I suppose somebody wanted them, too, and I'm to be cheated out of all my play, said Philip, in a very ill-natured tone."

"Your father took them to the shop this morning to have them mended for your Saturday holiday," replied his mother, taking out the gingersnaps she had just made from the large pan, and disregarding her son's petulance. But Phil's temper was roused, and even his father's thoughtfulness failed to mollify him.

"I don't care. I wish people would leave my things alone," exclaimed the cross boy.

"Philip!" said his mother reproachfully.

"Well I do. What's the use of having things, if one can't get the good of them?"

Mrs. Ames had observed for some time Philip's growing selfishness, and the unreasonableness which always goes hand in hand with it had pained her frequently of late. She had hoped it was only the consequence of too great indulgence during his sickness, two months before, and a fault which she could easily check, but her efforts thus far had been unavailing. She paused a moment after he had spoken, and glanced at his handsome face, at that instant seeming positively ugly by reason of the sulkiness which overspread it. Then she said cheerily: "Well, my son, there is no reason why you should not have your own things all to yourself, if you choose. Of course, if you are to have the entire enjoyment, you will also take the entire care of them."

"I guess I'd be glad enough to," answered Philip, a little surprised by his mother's matter-of-fact way of taking his remarks.

"Then I will resign all care of your property for the future, or at least as long as you wish," said Mrs. Ames, in quite a business-like tone, and going to the parlor she substituted a book of engravings for the nine pins, and brought the box to Philip. Presently Tom Watters also brought the sled, expressing his gratitude for the favor in a very earnest manner.

Philip was quite elated by his new authority, and played nine-pins on the setting-room carpet for at least ten minutes. Then he saw Dick Jones on the street, and ran out to speak to him, and coasted until tea time. He came in tired and hungry, to find his nine-pins scattered from one end of the room to the other, as he had left them.

"Pick 'em up, Bess, won't you? I'm hungry as a bear."

"Bessie wanted to," remarked Mrs. Ames, "but I told her they were yours, and you preferred to take care of them."

Phil made no answer, but crept under the table and chairs to gather them up, while the family sat down to tea.

"I broke my sled, father," said Philip, after blunting the edge of his hunger with a delicious biscuit, "and left it at the shop for you to bring home with my skates."

His father looked up with an expression of great surprise, and answered:

"That's very awkward for you, Phil. Your skates are here, and are not mended. I brought them home for you to attend to yourself. However, you can have your sled mended all the same, I suppose."

"But the money," faltered Phil, a horrible suspicion creeping over him. "How shall I pay for it?"

"That's your look out of course. The sled is yours, you know," responded Mr. Ames with the utmost coolness.

Poor Phil! A choking sensation began to seriously interfere with the progress of that second biscuit; but he had saved a few shillings for missionary money, and the thought of this as furnishing a way out of his dilemma restored his wonted serenity. As for the skates, they must remain unmended.

That night, when Philip was undressing, he did what boys are wont to do, wrenched one or two buttons from his clothes, and calling down to his mother, carelessly informed her of the fact, and threw his suit down the stairs to her to mend. The door opened immediately, and her pleasant voice called up to him:

"Here, Philip, I have put thread and needles and buttons on the stairs. They are your clothes, you know, and I am not to mend them of course."

Phil pretended not to hear. But Mrs. Ames waited, and finally asked:

"Do you hear Philip?"

"Yes, ma'am," answered the poor boy, repressing a great sob. The door closed, and Philip feeling quite deserted as if he were a hundred miles away from the dear home, dropped his head between his hands and cried bitterly. After a while he crept softly down stairs, and bringing up his new and unwelcome possessions, began his talk. It is needless to tell how many times the needles broke and the thread knotted, before the work was ended, and how sore his fingers were with useless stabs, and how the buttons burst off the next morning because he had sewed them on with single thread, and how he pinned his clothes and was pricked by the pins cruelly all the next day.

He could not skate that Saturday, on account of his broken skates, and when he went for his sled, he discovered that he had not enough money to pay for it, and when he entered his room at night, it was in the same disorder in which he had left it in the morning. Philip was completely humbled by his miserable day, and by the prospect of always wearing clothes which were pinned together, and of sleeping, night after night in a tumbled bed. Worse than all, he had seemed an outcast from that helpful household.

His mother had also endured the punishment as long as she was able to bear it, and with an aching heart went softly up to her son's room. As she opened the door, she saw Phil with his head on the table sobbing like a homesick boy. In a moment her faithful arms were about him.

"Is my darling tired of his selfishness?" she asked.

"Give—'em—all—away—and—take me—back," sobbed Philip.

"Do you see that we need others to make us comfortable and happy, and that we ought to give as well as take?"

"Oh! yes—I—do," answered Phil with great energy.

Then his mother smoothed the tumbled bed and made the disordered room tidy and beautiful, as mothers know so well how to do, and Phil's lesson was never forgotten.—Christian Union.

THE LOSS OF SELF-RESPECT

Real self-respect is that high, noble, manly feeling, which comes only from doing right and from having a good heart. The moment you do wrong, or do a mean act (and meanness is the worst form of wrong-doing), that moment you lose your self-respect. Last fall I seen some boys in my orchard stealing apples. I went up to the fence, intending to call out to them to take all they wanted and welcome, only next time to ask before they took. I had no hostile intention, but as soon as they saw me they ran as if for dear life. A boy who respects himself holds up his head, and runs away from no man. Self-reproach always accompanies the loss of self-respect. When you have done anything wrong, although the world may not know it, you know it yourself, and you cannot get away from the thought.

Some years ago, when I was a boy, a party of us boys went, one afternoon, and made a sort of a camp on the edge of a pond, known as Pitman's Pond, because it was on the farm of a man named Pitman. We built a house of bark and branches, and a large fire-place and chimney of flat stones, and in it we made a roaring fire. It was grand fun. We played that we were sailors cast ashore, wrecked, and that we could live there till some ship passed by. Of course we must live, so we went into neighbor Pitman's melon patch and helped ourselves to the best melons; then we tried his corn field, and returned to our fire with great stores of green corn, which we roasted by the fire, and ate our plunder with great relish. I felt all the time that it was wrong, but were we not playing wrecked sailors, and were we not entitled to food wherever we could find it? But this flimsy excuse would not do. In plain English, I had been stealing melons and corn, and could not deceive myself by any talk of "wrecked sailors." A few days after, I was walking down the road when "Old Pitman" came along in his waggon. I tried to avoid him, but he hailed me (I guess he suspected that I was one of the melon thieves) and asked me to get in and ride with him. I tried to excuse myself, but he was all of a sudden, as I thought, very kind, and insisted on my riding with him. I at last consented, and took my seat by his side. He began then to tell about the raid on his melon patch. How "a lot of boys from over where they were building the railroad—Irish boys, who had not been taught better, boys whose bringing up had been bad, boys whom we should pity and try to reform," and all that kind of thing—had been robbing his melon patch, etc. I tell you boys, he was awful hard on me; every word cut me like a knife; till finally, when he said, "Of course, Chris, you, with your good bringing up, never would do such a thing!"—when he said this I melted quite down, and I burst into tears and sobbed out, "Mr. Pitman I did it. I took those melons, and I am very sorry for it." I was utterly humiliated; my self respect was gone, and I did what was the best thing for me to do—I confessed, and asked forgiveness. After my confession he gave me a few kind words of admonition, excused me on the ground that I was probably led away thoughtlessly in my play, and then he forgave me; and when I parted from him he shook hands kindly, and in his cheery way said, "Now, Chris, don't err again by doing a mean act, by which you lose your self-respect."

Before I saw Mr. Pitman. I thought nobody knew that I took those melons. At home everybody treated me as kindly as ever. People bowed to me as pleasantly, and my Sunday school teacher was as candid, but all the time I had the inward consciousness that I had done wrong, and I was not happy. I had lost my self-respect, and when that is gone a sad load takes its place on the heart. Self-respect makes a boy light-hearted and jolly, but the loss of it weighs him down most fearfully.—Churchman.

Multitudes of Christains are getting rich. Five thousand dollar incomes are common, ten thousand not rare, and larger ones are frequently met. How to manage this fortune is the question, while it should be, how to keep it from managing us. A good brother said, in Philadelphia, not long since, I promised the Lord if he would give me $50,000 I would give Him all over, and He has given me twice that. He never thought how he was condemning himself. The Methodist has some wise thoughts on this subject. If every successful man would read these words, and obey them, he would grow rich towards God.

"We would not have men desist from the lawful pursuit of wealth, but we would have them comprehend the true character of the enterprise in which they are engaged. Riches bring an increase of responsibility which cannot be transferred to another. The faculty to acquire money which is given to some, while denied to others, is a talent, and is subject to the same laws which regulate the possession of other talents. Some men have a gift of public speaking; this gift they are to use only for the promotion of the right, whether in the pulpit, the forum or at the bar. In like manner others have the gift of money-making. Every thing they touch seems to turn into gold. God has bestowed this gift on them that they might bless the world. If they employ it merely to hoard money, or to squander on themselves, they are recreant to a most sacred trust, and must account to God."

Ninety fallen women have been received during the year at the Erring Women's Refuge, Chicago; of whom ten have been restored to friends, seventeen provided with employment in Christian families and four sent to other institutions. Funds are needed to extend the already successful work.
