Poetry.

MY SAVIOUR.

I am not skilled to understand
What God hath willed, what God hath planned:
I only know at His right hand
Stands one who is my Saviour.

I take God at His word and deed,
"Christ died to save me,"—this I read;
And in my heart I find a need
Of Him to be my Saviour.

And had there been in all this wide,
Sad world, no other soul beside,
But only mine, yet He had died,
That he might be its Saviour;—

One wounded spirit, sore oppressed;
One wearied soul that found no rest
Until it found it on the breast
Of Him that was its Saviour;—

Then He had left His Father's throne,
The joy untold, the love unknown,
And for that soul had given His own,
That He might be its Saviour.

And oh, that He fulfilled may see
The travail of His soul in me,
And with His work contented be,
As I with my dear Saviour!

Yes, living, dying, let us bring
Our strength, our solace, from this spring,
That He who lives to be our King
Once died to be our Saviour.

Miscellaneous.

MAUD'S STRUGGLE.

BY TRACY TOWNE.

"Would'nt it be better for you to pick up your sewing, Maud, before you go?" asked Aunt Esther, in her quiet, even tone.

"No it would not;" cried Maud, turning about, with her hand on the door-handle, and facing her aunt angrily; "I don't want to stay in this room with you another minute. I shall write to my father this very day, and tell him that he must send for me right off. I never was treated so before in my life, no, never!" And Maud dashed from the room, slamming the door violently behind her, and ran up stairs.

"Oh, if I were only a hyena, and could tear her into inch pieces!" gasped the angry child, as she sank into a chair in the farthest corner of her room; "or an elephant, so that I could throw her down, and trample her into a perfect jelly with my feet! Oh, would'nt I enjoy it! I say she has no right, no right to domineer over me so. I can't do that sewing, Oh, I can not!" And Maud burst into a passion of tears.

"O Maud!" What have you been doing?" groaned poor conscience in dismay, when there was a slight lull in the tempest of Maud's grief. "Have you forgotten all the resolutions you made last Sabbath? Have you forgotten all your promises to your dead mother? Have you forgotten how anxious she was that you should learn all about sewing and mending, and all the other little things, about which you are so ignorant, and which she was too weak and ill to teach you? Is this trying to control your temper? Is this trying to be like Christ?"

"And then your father's last letter," continued the faithful little monitor, "have you forgotten how much he praised Aunt Esther; how thankful he seemed to feel that she was willing to guide and teach his motherless girl; how affectionately he urged you to obey her, just as if she were your own dear mother?"

"Yes, yes, I have forgotten" retorted Maud's naughty heart. "I don't want to remember; I won't remember! I don't want to be good; it's no use trying. I have been so wicked now that Christ will never forgive me. I never can be a Christian; I shall give it all up."

Just at this moment the door opened broadly, and in walked a pleasant looking young man, whistling carelessly, and apparently intent upon reaching a closet in the room, when suddenly a sharp little voice cried out, "Go away, go away! Oh, do let me alone!"

"Upon my word," exclaimed Cousin John, stopping short, "this room is inhabited! I thought it was sewing-hour," he added, advancing cautiously toward the corner where his little cousin sat.

"I wish I were dead!" sobbed Maud passionately, at the bare mention of sewing-hour.

"Perhaps I could assist you to destroy yourself," said Cousin John, coolly. "How would it do for me to throw you out of the window? This is the third story, and there is the pavement below. I'would be a pretty sure thing, I should think;" he added, throwing up the window and taking a critical survey.

Maud's tears began to dry.

"Or," continued Cousin John, "they say drowning is an easy death. If you will go down to the river with me, I will cut a hole in the ice, and you can drop yourself in. How would you like that?"

Maud shivered as the cold air blew in at the open window, but made no reply.

"Ah, I've thought of something better still!" exclaimed Cousin John; and going to the medicine-closet in the hall, he returned with a bottle. "There, Maud! Laudanum will do it for your after all, in the easiest, quickest, and best manner. Some people like the taste of it very much, and I'm sure the odor is not unpleasant. Won't you take a whiff?"

But although all was quiet behind the handkerchief, now, the hankerchief itself remained unmoved.

"Well," said Cousin John, with a sigh of disappointment, "this I consider my last resort. If you refuse this I'm afraid I shall have to leave you to your own resources. Only I should like to ask"——

Here Cousin John seated himself and preserved a discreet silence.

Silence for fifteen seconds. Then a slight movement behind the handkerchief, and presently one of Maud's eyes appeared. But cousin John was gazing fixedly at the wall. Then both eyes peeped out. Still no movement on the part of Cousin John. At length, after carefully covering her eyes with her handkerchief again, Maud ventured to ask, "Isn't it rather cold here?"

"Why, so it is." And Cousin John jumped up and shut the window. Then taking his bottle he moved toward the door.

But Maud could restrain her curiosity no longer. "Come back a minute, please, Cousin John," she said, as that individual was stepping out into the hall.

"Oh yes, I was after my vest, wasn't I?" And cousin John turned toward the closet.

"But there was something you wanted to ask," cried Maud, forgetting herself in her eagerness, and letting her handkerchief fall to the ground.

"Oh, certainly, certainly!" And before Maud could say Jack Robinson, Cousin John had not only picked the handkerchief up, and pocketed it, but had seated himself and whisked his little cousin upon his knee.

"Now, Maud," he said kindly, but seriously, "what is this all about? Tell me the whole story."

"O dear!" began Maud, "I wish I had been born without a temper. I've been saying dreadful things to your mother, now."

"For instance"—suggested Cousin John.

"Well, for instance—Oh, I do hate to sew!"

"So I've heard," remarked Cousin John.

"Yes, I know I'm always talking about it. Well, I'll begin again. This afternoon I was in such a hurry to try the new parlor-croquet board, that I didn't want to sew a bit, and perhaps I didn't take pains enough. Of course Amy got through first, she always does, she sews so beautifully; and just then Harry put his head in at the door, and said, "Come, girls, I'm all ready for a game!" I wanted to go so much. 'O aunty,' said I, 'mayn't I go too, my sewing is nearly done.' 'Well,' said aunty, 'you may this once if your sewing is nearly done.' Oh, I was so glad! But when I looked over my own work as I carried it to her, I felt afraid; and, sure enough, when she saw it, she said it must all come out."

"She seemed to be very sorry about it; but I was dreadfully angry. I took my work when she gave it to me, and threw it across the room, and then I started to come up here. Just as I opened the door, aunty spoke to me, and asked me if I hadn't better pick up my sewing; and then I was very disrespectful. I've forgotten exactly what I said, but I told her I didn't want to stay with her, and that I should ask papa to send for me right off."

"It's a pretty bad case," said Cousin John, shaking his head.

"I believe I'm sorry now, but I wasn't at first," said Maud humbly.

"Are you sorry enough to confess your fault, and do your sewing over again?"

"Oh, no, no!" cried Maud starting up, "I can't do that! Oh, I can't ask auntie's pardon! And then that sewing, how can I do it? It will take me all the afternoon."

"I don't know anything else that you can do, and do right, Maud."

"I don't want to do right," said Maud sullenly. "I can't be a Christian; it's no use."

"Why not?"

"Why"—besitated Maud—"why, because I keep doing wrong all the time."

"If you keep doing wrong all the time, Maud, what sort of a person are you?"

"Why, I suppose I'm horrid," said Maud dolefully.

"Well, yes," said Cousin John, smiling. "But suppose we put it another way. We will say you keep sinning all the time, and therefore you are a sinner. Now the Bible says that Christ came into the world to save sinners. This, then, is just the time you need Christ, is'nt it?"

"I suppose so," said Maud, doubtfully.

"Maud," said Cousin John, after a few moments' pause, "I went out gunning the other day, and forgot to carry a lunch. When I came home at night mother had a nice little supper waiting for me. Now, supposing I had said, I think 'I wont eat anything now, mother, I'm so very hungry.' Wouldn't that have been an absurd reason?"

"Why yes," cried Maud. "What an idea! If you were hungry, that was the very reason why you should eat."

"My reason would be no more absurd than yours, Maud. You say that just because you are a sinner, you should give up going to Christ for forgiveness, when that is the very reason why you should go."

"But I have been to him so many times," said Maud, "and yet I keep doing wrong."

"So have I eaten very many times, yet I keep feeling hungry; is that any reason why I should not eat again?"

"Why no," said Maud. You'll keep feeling hungry as long as you live."

"So will you keep feeling that you are sinful, as long as you live; and that is the very reason why you need such a Saviour as Christ, to whom you can always go and have your sins forgiven."

"But I thought after a while that Christians became entirely good," said Maud.

"Never, Maud, in this life. You will always feel the need of having your sins forgiven, just as you will always feel the need of having your hunger satisfied, for a time, with food. You know Christ calls himself the 'Bread of Life,' and teaches us to pray 'Give us this day our daily bread.' He wants us to keep feeling our need of him."

"And don't you think, Maud," continued Cousin John, "that when he is so ready to forgive us, so loving, and patient, and tender towards us, that we ought sometimes to feel that we should like to show our love for him in some way?"

Maud's eyes filled with tears. "Oh, I wish that I could be good all the time, so that I never should displease him," murmured she.

"You know how you can show your love to him this afternoon," said Cousin John, gently, as he rose to go. "I will leave you to think about it."

Poor Maud! It was a hard struggle between her pride and her desire to please Christ; but she knew where to go for help, and it was not very long before Aunt Esther looked up from her work, to find a humble little girl standing by her side, saying, "I'm sorry I spoke so, Aunt Esther, I'll do my work over again, now."

Aunt Esther folded the child to her motherly heart. She guessed what a battle poor wayward Maud had fought with her hot pride. "My dear Maud," she said, "you have learnt a better lesson this afternoon than a lesson in needlework. Besides, it is growing late, so you need only rip out your work now, then you may go and play croquet, and I will give you a little longer stint than usual to-morrow."

This was the last time that Maud gave up trying to be a Christian. Although she often did wrong, she felt that she had a Saviour who was always ready to forgive her. And when she remembered that this same Saviour said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments," she tried daily to show her love to him by overcoming her faults. And though she never became "entirely good," yet with the loving guidance of gentle Aunt Esther, she at last began to show to others that there was a little love to Christ in her heart.

But it was after many days.—Congregationalist.

TELL YOUR MOTHER.—I wonder how many girls tell their mother everything. Not those "young ladies," who, going to and from school, smile, bow, and exchange notes and carte de visite with young men who make fun of them and their pictures, speaking in a way that would make their cheeks burn with shame if they knew it. All this, most credulous and romantic young lady, they will do, although they gaze at your fresh young faces admiringly, and send or give you charming verses and bouquets. No matter what "other girls do," do not you do it. School-girl flirtation may end disastrously, as many a foolish, wretched young girl could tell you. Your yearning for some one to love is a great need of every woman's heart. But there is a time for everything. Do not let the bloom and freshness of your heart be brushed off in silly flirtations. Render yourself truly intelligent. And, above all, tell your mother everything. Never be ashamed to tell her, who should be your best friend and confidant, all you think and feel. It is so very strange that so many young girls will tell every person before a mother, that which is most important that she should know. It is very sad that indifferent persons should know more about her own fair daughter than she does herself.—Religious Telescope.

None can know that they are Christ's unless they are diligent in making their calling and election sure.
