LONDON, APRIL 14.

We are happy to state, that notwithstanding the inflammatory resolutions of the City Demagogues, so industriously and so expeditiously circulated among the ignorant classes of society (who alone could be deluded by such base artifices,) notwithstanding the infamous endeavours of the incendiaries to kindle a flame of riot and revolt throughout the land, the counter efforts of the loyal and well-disposed classes of His Majesty's subjects have prevailed, and all, most happily, is now perfectly tranquil in the provinces. Whether it be owing to this favourable result, or not, that the Opposition Writers have again lost their temper, we cannot pretend to say; but certain it is that they have, within the last two days, become as senselessly intemperate and almost as violently outrageous in their language as we ever before remembered them, even in the bitterest moments of the disappointment of the factious and interested hopes of their friends. They have availed themselves of the hostile aspect of affairs in the North, to re-commence their turgid and senseless declamations against Ministers; and in the wrath of their factious hearts, exclaim, "what shall be said of those wretched Ministers, whose whole time and attention, at so tremendous a crisis of our affairs abroad, is spent in intriguing to get a Lord or a Commoner the more, to support them in their places?"—We are very ready to admit, that if the charge thus insinuated had any foundation in fact, the Ministers who so conducted themselves, would deserve the severest censure; that it is as utterly void of candour, as it is of truth and justice, must be obvious to every observer of the conduct of Government, and of their continued indefatigable exertions in aid of the common cause of Europe, against the unprincipled invader of its independence and its rights. And what, we would ask in our turn, shall be said of those men, whose whole time and attention, at so tremendous a crisis, are employed only in endeavours to force themselves into power, against the sense of the country, and the wishes of the PRINCE REGENT, after having rejected his gracious overture to them to co-operate in office for the common interest of the Empire, and who, at this momentous crisis of our fate, are doing all in their power to excite disunion, discontent, and despondency at home, and to thwart and frustrate our exertions abroad; "BONAPARTE" (say they) "sets out upon this final plan of conquest, knowing that a most powerful diversion is, at this very moment, operating in his favour, by the mal-administration of affairs in this country." Without dignifying so common place an accusation, so gross and palpable a falsehood (capable of being detected by the most indifferent observer of events,) with any degree of serious attention; we cannot help observing, that the matchless effrontery it displays, is really too much from the men who, when they were in Office, saw the destruction of Prussia, and the defeat of Russia, without moving a single man to assist them, and whose conduct afforded such just grounds of disgust to the latter, as to induce her, not only to forsake us entirely, but in a manner, to throw herself, in opposition to us, into the hands of the common enemy of both. No, no, ye degenerate sons of Old England—if BONAPARTE look for a diversion in this country, it is from the exertions of those who are ready to sacrifice its best interests to promote their own private interest and ambition, who are straining every nerve to increase those divisions, which owe their existence to the artifices of the Faction, and who seem careless of consequences, provided they can remove their adversaries, and seize upon the whole power and patronage of the State.

A scene of considerable interest took place in the House of Commons last night, in the Debate upon the subject of the Barrack Estimates. Mr. WHITBREAD availed himself of the occasion to go over all his old favourite ground of objection to the necessary military arrangements of the country, and indulge in his usual dismal forebodings with respect to our present situation, and the probable result of the contest in which we are engaged. He was most ably answered by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, who in a neat strain of irony observed how well calculated the sentiments of the Hon. Gentleman were to tranquillize the country at the present moment, and how very candid and honorable it was in him to attribute by insinuation, the scarcity now complained of to the misconduct of Government. It is really lamentable to see such a Gentleman as Mr. WHITBREAD so eagerly entertain every ignorant and vulgar sentiment that he finds broached in the numerous inflammatory publications with which the metropolis is at present disgraced. It is very well for such persons as Mr. WATTMAN and Mr. FAVELL to hold such language to the rabble in the Common Hall, and for their partizans afterwards to proclaim their gross misrepresentations and wilful falsehoods to the ignorant and the deluded throughout the country; but, as the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, it was scarce to be expected that any Member of Parliament could be found who would come down to the House for the purpose of making statements, which we do not for our part hesitate to say, are a disgrace even to the low and vile faction from whom they originally proceeded. But, truly lamentable to think, so thorough-paced a partizan of the mob is Mr. WHITBREAD now become, so anxious is he to "pander to their worst passions," that the magnitude of the absurdity most grateful to their taste, is nothing in his partial estimation, so as it does but afford him an opportunity, right or wrong, of abusing Ministers, however much it may be in defiance of his own better understanding, and his once manly and liberal mind. The common place vulgar cant in regard to the necessity of immediate peace, at a time when Mr. WHITBREAD, and even Mr. WATTMAN and Mr. FAVELL, know in their hearts that it is not possibly to be obtained but on terms that would prove the ultimate ruin of the country, is so
