- All the Scholars shall appear in the School decently dressed, and with clean hands and face, and if any one shall be absent from Prayers, or appear with dirty hands or face, he shall be reprimanded or moderately corrected, and the Master is desired to enforce the regular and punctual attendance of the Scholars as well for their own advantage, as for the credit of the School.
- The School shall be divided into five Classes, the Scholars remaining ordinarily one year in each Class. But if on account of the youth, dullness, or negligence of any Scholar, it shall appear improper at the end of the year, to advance him to another Class, he may be continued six months, or a year longer in the same Class, at the Master's discretion.

- Every Scholar is to be ready with a lesson for recitation immediately upon the opening of the School, at each period in the day, and the Master is requested to vary the order in which the Classes and individuals in the several Classes shall be called upon to recite, in order to ascertain that this regulation be strictly obeyed.—Exclusively of this first lesson, the Scholars, shall be prepared, and shall be heard, to recite as many other lessons or tasks as shall be sufficient to keep them closely and diligently devoted to their studies during the remainder of each school period in the day; and the lessons and recitals designated for one period, shall in no case be postponed to another, but in case of sickness, or other unavoidable accident.
- Instruction in Writing, Arithmetic, Geography, History, and similar branches shall make a part of the Exercises for the afternoon in each day, the forenoon Exercises being exclusively restricted to Latin and Greek.
- No English Prose translations shall be on any account made use of in the School; but the first Class may be allowed to use Pitt's or Dryden's Virgil, Francis's Horace and Pope's Homer, to help them to understand and reach the sense of the Originals.
- The Master will, at discretion, employ the Scholars in parsing; scanning, exemplifications of the Rules of Grammar, translating passages from Cæsar, Sallust, or other School Books, and turning the same, some time afterwards, into Latin again. He will also in the exercises of the afternoon occasionally hear the Scholars read aloud from the approved English Classics, Poets, and other authors, and teach them a proper emphasis, full and clear articulation and due deliberation in reading; and prescribe lessons from Lindley Murray's English Grammar, to the Scholars in the several Classes, so that they may obtain a correct Grammatical knowledge of the English language and a relish for its beauties.
