

Paris, March 27.

We are assured that a great personage (the Duke D'Angouleme), who had perhaps the greatest reason to complain of DeBelle, and of his conduct in the South, has been the first to intercede with His Majesty in behalf of the convict; and that the King, whose clemency is inexhaustible, has been pleased to commute the punishment of death to ten years imprisonment.

Numerous discharges are taking place in the Prussian armies, which indicate the approach of a great reduction.

The Prince Regent--Last night, at a quarter before eleven o'clock, the Prince Regent arrived at Carlton-House, in his new travelling carriage, attended by Sir Benjamin Bloomfield, from Brighton, which he left at two o'clock. His Royal Highness, we rejoice to learn, is very much improved in health and spirits. This day his Royal Highness is expected to hold a Council, to receive the Report of the unfortunate persons under sentence of death in Newgate; who it is thought, unless there be any very aggravated instance to call for exception, are all likely to experience the royal mercy, in commutation of punishment, remitting the capital part of their sentences.

Among the different subjects which the German diet will have to deliberate upon at Frankfort, is what relates to the strength and composition of the garrison of the fortress of Luxemburg in the time of peace; the inhabitants wish that it might be wholly composed of national troops.

BONAPARTE AT ST. HELENA.

By accounts which have been received from St. Helena to the 14th December, it appears that the arrangements for restraining the late Usurper of the French throne to the narrow limits of his present confinement are carried into full effect. Between three and four miles from the little sort of village which is dignified with the title of James-town after ascending a narrow, winding road, bordered with ravines and precipices, you reach a small plain of about a mile and a quarter in length, terminated by an abrupt cliff overhanging, at a considerable elevation, the sea. About the middle of this plain stands Longwood. It is situated on the top of a hill, and is the only flat piece of ground on the island. It is nearly three miles in circumference with a good road and walks for exercise. He was accompanied to this spot by Sir George Cockburn, Captain Mackay, and Mr. Glover, Secretary to Sir George. Upon entering the house he expressed himself much gratified at the pains which had been taken to render his abode comfortable. He had visited the house on his first arrival, when it was in a state of disorder, and the great change it had undergone in so short a time, apparently excited his gratitude. The house, which is small, is surrounded at every inlet by sentries regularly relieved. Half a mile in advance of the house stands the lodge, where an officer's guard is stationed, suffering no individual to pass without a written order signed by the Admiral's own hand. The opposite front of the house is about three-quarters of a mile from the cliff before-noticed; on the one side is an impassable ravine, on the other an unscalable mountain. The space within these limits is all that is assigned to the movements of the state prisoner. There is, besides within the boundary, an encampment for 250 or 300 men; and on every commanding eminence, at every point which can serve to keep his movements under view, sentries are posted, who may be said to form the interior line of circumvallation. He is in good health, and, we are assured, does not discover any depression of spirits from his fallen circumstances. The arrangements made at St. Helena by Sir George Cockburn, for his safe custody, are said to be admirable, and strictness and punctuality are worked into a perfect system: the ships of war are constantly cruising in sight of the island, one to the leeward, the other to windward, and between which and the signal posts on the island there is incessant communication kept up. No vessel of any description can possibly approach the island without being discovered by our cruisers. The island of Ascension has been fortified, and a party of men landed to garrison it. One sloop of war is constantly stationed there. The Peruvian, J. K. White, had just sailed to relieve the Zenobia, Capt. Dobree, in that service. The Northumberland (flag-ship), Havanah, Icaus, Ferret and Ceylon, were lying at St. Helena.

GEORGIA.

AUGUST, MARCH 1.

GEN. GAINES has ordered all the U. S. troops to the frontier, in consequence of an expected opposition to the demarcation of the new boundary lines, by the Creek Indians. Two men are reported to have been lately shot by these Indians.
