

POETRY.

FOR THE N. B. ROYAL GAZETTE

TO FANCY.

Thou exquisite Blossom, enchanting, refin'd,
With fragrance and loveliness ric,
Whose odour ambrosial impregnates the mind
And sweetens the Garden of life,
In the Spring of Existence when Nature looks bright.

In Paradise planted, by innocence rear'd,
Ere sin devastation began,
The Site of our Race by thy redolence cheer'd
Pronounc'd thee—the comfort of man,
Thy root was refresh'd (when thou blooming arose,
In the Ray sent by bliss from above)

Inspir'd by thine incense humanity soars,
(Beyond trembling humanity's line)
Where the river of Mercy triumphantly pours
Its streams over Regions divine,
In this hyaline Fountain which rolls thro' the skies
Thine image reflected declares.

Thou wert sent upon Earth that from thee should arise
The nepenthe of Mortals—to banish their sighs,
And destroy their distresses and cares.

I have seen thee adorn'd in each varying dye;
By genius and gracefulness given,
Whose richness and elegance dazzled the eye,
And proclaim'd thee—the daughter of Heaven,
Yet richer and fairer (tho' matchless before,
Unless on celestial ground.)

Thus gorgeous and splendid in mortal array,
Oh! how will thy splendour increase,
When Angels exulting shall bear the away,
To a clime of contentment and peace,
The twilight of passion shall cause thee to fade,
Shall cloud and obscure thee an hour,
But eternity's morning shall scatter the shade,
And cherubs admiring shall view thee display'd,
In the Smile of Omnipotent power.

JULIUS.

From Bell's Weekly Messenger.

An original elegy upon the death of her
Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte of Wales.

How blind in choice is human will,
How mix'd the forms of good and ill,
How vain we seek, how blindly shun;
Rashly pursue, what gained, destroys,
And chase our ruin in our joys,
By what we wish, undone.

How many vows of late prevail'd,
How many hearts already hail'd,
The promis'd days begun;
When Charlotte should adorn her throne,
With British virtues all her own,
Repeated in her son.

But, ah, how frail the brightest dies,
With which vain hope o'erspread her skies;
How varying fortune's hue:
That hour,—which we so fondly view'd,
As pregnant with our highest good,
That hour our hopes withdrew.

Our British sky was all serene,
As the first age in nature seen,
Whilst wars were yet unknown;
The bounteous heavens had crown'd our store,
And peace, long woo'd, had blest our shore,
With triumphs nobly won.

When lo! the thunderclap was heard;
The bolt was felt before 'twas fear'd—
Such was the will of heaven;
The direful news at once was spread,
That Sire, the nation's hope, was dead;
No sign, no warning given.

No previous ill, no slow disease,
To soften death by just degrees,
No danger seen at hand;
In gallant trim the vessel rode,
The seas were calm, the tempest sooth'd,
The steersman hail'd the land.

When lo! by adverse fate releas'd,
Like hurricanes in Indian seas,
The winds in fury sweep;
The waves, as tempted by their prize,
Impetuous from their caverns rise,
To whelm it in the deep.

Ah! what is hope? a painted cloud,
A promis'd bliss, a real shroud,
A random good or ill;
Which in the self-same body brings:
Its honey, and its mortal sting,
And heals, or hurts, or will.

Hard, but less hard, if fate's decree,
Had cropt the flower, but saved the tree
To give some future shoot:
But ah! that stroke, which aimed at one,
Has thus a double mischief done—
Has fell'd both tree and fruit!

Farewell! bright star of English birth,
Thou pattern of domestic worth;
Just emblem of our fair;
A wife,—who every grace display'd,
A child,—whose steady virtue paid
A suffering mother's care.

Farewell! for thou hast gain'd that peace,
Where pains are past, and troubles cease,
From future labours free;
Farewell! and when we weep the fate,
That bears thee in a happier state,
We weep ourselves,—not thee.

XII.

And thou, sad mourner, sooth thy grief,
And seek that sure and best relief,
The memory of her worth;
Thy grief is common to us all,
A weeping country holds the pall,
And mourns thy widow'd truth.

XIII.

As lov'd and living, made you one,
So now, thy wedded partner gone,
On thee we fix our view:
Her life unstain'd, her spotless truth,
Her meekness, her unsullied youth,
Surviving still in you.
