OCTOBER 14.

The removal of the Allied Troops from France has always been to us as a matter of alarm for the tranquillity of Europe, and if the Combined Sovereigns have assented to that measure, without a sufficient security, they will have done worse than nothing. Yet, we confess, that we know not what security they could have obtained, and still think, that the Guard for Europe, which the presence of those troops in France afforded, should not be relinquished till time has settled that County in a more stable state. Even The Morning Chronicle which has hitherto been an advocate for the removal of the Allied Troops, has a letter this day which seems to threaten the consequences which we have often predicted, and must still apprehend.

We call the particular attention of our mercantile Readers to the Judgement delivered at Halifax, Nova-Scotia, on a question of great importance to the Commercial Interest of the British Empire and its American Dependencies. It will be found in The Sun of this day, under the head of THE COLONIES; a department which we shall endeavour to make a prominent as well as permanent feature in this Paper, and for which we are promised ample supplies by our Mercantile Connexions. We much regret that we cannot give the whole of this important and interesting Judgement at once, on account of its length, as it would interfere with the miscellaneous character of our Journal, by which we endeavour to gratify readers in general; but we shall present it in such large proportions as will preserve a due connection in the mind, and probably conclude it on Friday.—It is needless for us to comment on the sound knowledge and dignified temper by which this Judgement is characterized, &c.: the eloquent manner in which it is expressed, the respectful modesty with which the Judge speaks of Sir William Scott, and the well-merited homage which he pays to that enlightened ornament of British Judicature; but we should be unjust to the Government at home if we did not advert to the wisdom which it has shewn in the selection of so learned an Expositor of British Laws, and so firm and able a Supporter of British Rights, as the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Halifax, in Nova-Scotia.

OCTOBER 15.

By the arrival of a Gentleman, this day, from Paris, we learn, that the alarm has become general among the English families, since the news of the Army quitting has been known. They are all leaving the French Capital, and selling property to a great loss. On his arrival at Calais that place was full of our Countrymen, waiting for packets to convey them to Dover.

OCTOBER 16.

We received this morning the Paris Papers of Tuesday last. The Journal des Debats, after giving the official notice respecting the signature of the Convention at Aix-la-Chapelle, which was published in the Moniteur of Monday says:—

"We are enabled to add to this article some details which we have from good authority.

"The Allied Powers have warmly expressed their satisfaction at the internal state of France, and with the guarantees which its situation offers for the duration of general tranquillity. The system of Government acted upon by his Majesty, is the principal of these guarantees; but Europe has also to render a splendid homage to the wisdom of the immense majority of the French nation, who, by acting in union with the principles of the Monarch, have endeavoured to efface the recollection of those discords, which have too long agitated France, and in consequence the world.

"The Powers were also highly satisfied with the guarantees offered for the payment of the sums remaining due on the part of France. It was in order to give a new testimony of their high esteem for the King that they reduced the total of these sums from 280 to 265,000,000. They have also given a proof of their entire confidence in the future situation of France, and in the solidity of our public credit, by accepting the payment of 100,000,000 in Rentes on the State.

"The sums, it appears, have been divided amongst the different powers in the following manner:—To Russia 40,000,000,

England the same, Austria and Prussia about 40,000,000 each, the Netherlands 22,000,000, Bavaria 10,000,000, and to the other Powers the remaining 57,000,000; the whole being proportioned to the sacrifices they have made of the losses they have experienced.

"We shall not enter into the details respecting the period of the departure of the different corps of troops, but shall merely observe, that in order not to encumber the roads, or exhaust the country through which the Allies must effect their march, it has been found necessary to establish a certain distance between the departure of each corps. It is believed that the English will commence their march the 20th and 21st instant. They will arrive at Calais the 24th, where transports are to be in readiness to receive them. The Prussians, Russians, and Saxons, will arrange their march so as not too nearly to follow each other. They are all to pass through the north of Germany. The Russians will continue their march to Poland. All the other Contingents will follow also at certain distances.

"We hope that in a few days we shall see again within our walls the able Minister whose talents and high character have so powerfully contributed to accelerate the negotiations. He will bring back with us the pleasing trophies of peace, and until then, impatient curiosity may well content itself with what is already known.

"Although these events were with certainty foreseen, they cannot fail to excite a general satisfaction amongst all Frenchmen; and still further, to increase the force and vivacity of those sentiments of gratitude and devotion which our hearts have long felt towards a Monarch, whose profound wisdom, admired by Europe, is the best rampart of our Country.

"The most wayward minds, if they are actuated by a good spirit, must also acknowledge that this happy termination of the difficulties in which France has been involved by the deplorable event of the 20th March, could not have been brought about without some ability on the part of those who direct our affairs, for even the most ardent of their friends, on the conclusion of the Treaty of the 20th November, could not have ventured to flatter themselves with so soon witnessing the happy day of our independence.

"It is also but justice, at such a moment, to acknowledge that the personal interviews of Sovereigns, formerly so formidable, are now a fertile source of benefits to nations. The personal virtues, and the amiableness of character, which in the Monarchs of our day so greatly enhance the splendor of the diadem, cannot but facilitate all negotiations, and simplify the science of diplomacy. These assemblies of Sovereigns and illustrious Statesmen, considered in whatever point of view, serve to create an European opinion—an opinion much more respectable, and much more fertile in happy results, than those vain caprices of an unenlightened multitude, which innovators wish to decorate with the pompous name of public opinion.

"It is by a calm and moderate conduct, by repelling perfidious counsels, the spirit of calumny and faction; it is by supporting with confidence the excellent intentions of Government, that nations will be enabled to pay to their Sovereigns, the universal debt of affection and gratitude, which has been imposed upon them by these august labours for the maintenance of peace and the progress of general prosperity.

OCTOBER 17.

The two ships, under the command of Captain Buchan, have arrived from the Northern Expedition. The utmost latitude reached by them was 80½, having unfortunately been damaged by a tremendous gale of wind, which compelled them to take shelter in the body of the ice, and in this situation the Dorothea was so much damaged as to oblige them to put into Smeerenberg Bay, in Spitzbergen to refit. It was then considered that the season was too far advanced to try for an open sea to the eastward of Spitzbergen, where it is supposed there is the greatest probability of a passage.

The failure of this interesting Expedition appears to have been owing entirely to a circumstance which no human foresight could controul; a most tremendous gale of wind, which drove the ships into the solid body of ice, and entirely disabled the Dorothea, which the Trent was afterwards obliged to stay by and take care of. At this moment they saw the sea open on the Eastward of Spitzbergen, and were pushing towards that quarter.

FREDERICTON, (N. B.)

15TH DECEMBER, 1818.

The English Mail, which arrived at the Post Office on Thursday last, brought London dates to the 17th of October, inclusive. At that date, the following Bulletin was issued from Kew Palace:—

"The QUEEN continued in a state of ease throughout yesterday, but Her MAJESTY has passed a less comfortable night. The symptoms of Her MAJESTY'S disorder remain the same as for some time past."

Tenders were to be received by the British Government on the 19th October, from any person that would wish to contract to bring the troops home from France.

It is said in the Evening Star, (a London paper) that a ship owner in Dover had contracted with Government, at 4s. 6d. per man.
