

SELECTED POETRY.

"ONE GLASS MORE!"

Stay, mortal, stay! not heedless thus
 Thy sure destruction seal;
 Within that cup there lurks a curse,
 Which all who drink shall feel;
 Disease and death, forever nigh;
 Stand ready at the door,
 And eager wait to hear the cry
 Of give me "one glass more!"

Go view that prison's gloomy cells—
 Their pallid tenants scan;
 Gaze, gaze upon these earthly hells,
 And ask when they began:
 Had these a tongue—Oh, man! thy cheek
 The answer'd crimson o'er;
 Had these a tongue, they'd to thee speak
 And cry the "one glass more!"

Behold that wretched female form,
 An outcast from her home;
 Bleach'd in Affliction's blighting storm,
 And doom'd in want to roam.
 Behold her!—ask that prattler deaf
 Why mother is so poor—
 He'll whisper in thy startled ear,
 'Twas FATHER'S "one glass more!"

Stay, mortal, stay! repent, return!
 Reflect upon thy fate;
 The poisonous draught indignant spurn—
 Spurn—spurn it 'ere too late:
 Oh, fly the alehouse' horrid din,
 Nor linger at the door,
 Lest thou, perchance, should'st sip agal'd
 The treach'rous "one glass more!"

HYPOCRISY.

..... "But as for dull Hypocrisy—Hypocrisy! I know her not!"

DERMODY.

I hate the sly, insidious breathing,
 That sighs its victim's fame away,
 Like ivy round the green stem wreathing,
 That clings but to betray!
 What'er my fate, heav'n keep me free
 From subtle, dark Hypocrisy!

I hate the fond, the fawning guise,
 The specious mask that falsehood wears—
 The soothing smile that mocks the eyes
 Which she has filled with tears.
 What'er my fate, let me not be
 Thy victim, dark Hypocrisy!

From the Middlesex Gazette.

Look through Nature up to Nature's God.

I have always looked upon the study of nature as the most familiar means of introducing into the minds of young persons suitable ideas of the attributes of the Divine Being, and of engaging their affections in the practice of religion. We find children endowed with curiosity and activity for the purpose of acquiring knowledge. Of these natural propensities, I have ever thought it my duty to avail myself, and to direct them to the pursuit of the most judicious objects; and none have appeared better adapted to instruct, and, at the same time, to amuse, than the beauties of nature, by which we are continually surrounded. The structure of a leaf or spire of grass is more likely to impress the tender mind with a just notion of infinite power and wisdom, than the most profound discourses on such abstract subjects as are beyond the limits of their capacity to comprehend. Accordingly, instead of compelling my children to commit to memory much of abstract speculations, which abound in many little books intended for the nursery, or of listening for hours to lectures (to them dry lectures) on morality and religion, I go forth into the fields with them, endeavor to excite their attention to every object which presents itself, however small and insignificant, and to cultivate in them a taste for the study of nature. I am always impressed with the truth, that informing the human mind, whether to science, to virtue, or to religion, the pleasure of the pupil is to be consulted; in order to render lessons effectual, they should please, and be sought rather as indulgencies, than avoided as laborious toils. In my excursions with my children, my first object is to discover to them that I see, and feel, and admire, myself; they naturally sympathise, and when their feelings are highly wrought up, I see some favorable moment to instil into their then peculiarly susceptible hearts, the principles and sentiments of benevolence—to lead their minds up to their great Creator of all that they behold, and to inspire them with good will to all mankind. It is not to be conceived how much little children may in this way be taught to know, and to feel, and to adore. To one, who has never been led to observe and to think on what is presented to his view—how uninteresting, how useless, is a long life: but how full of delight and improvement is every hour so him who has been accustomed to let nothing escape his notice, which nature opens to mind. A field, a garden, a leaf, is a book open for all; but they must have learnt and must have been accustomed to read it. My children, who eat their daily bread, are required to give an account of its ingredients, and of the process of preparation. So of their linen; of their woollen stuffs; of all, in fine, of their conveniences and luxuries. Thus they become inquisitive after knowledge—reflecting and devout. In all their investigations, I manage so as at least to lead them to extend their views up to God, as the object of their gratitude. What can give more pleasure to a parent than to see his children alive to the beauties of nature—hear their little voices in the garden, exclaiming, "O, lovely nature!—what an enamel is here—what colors—what riches—but what harmony and what sweetness in the mixture, and the shadowing that tempers them;—what a picture—and by what a master!—We ought to be grateful to our Father in Heaven for all these things. O, look at that tree: how it bows down its branches to the ground;—and what excellent fruit!—Does not that tree say to us by its glory—"Learn of me," young children, "what is the goodness and magnificence of the God who has made me for you. It is neither for him, nor for myself, I am so rich. He has need of nothing, and I cannot use what he has given me. Bless him, and unload me. Give him thanks; and since he has made me the instrument of your delight, be ye the organ of my gratitude."
