BOSTON, Dec. 20.

By the James Munroe, arrived in New-York, from Liverpool, London papers to the afternoon of November 2, have been received.

The trial of the Queen approached its close in the British House of Lord the 2d November. On that day, the question, Shall the Bill of Pains and Penalties be read a second time? was discussed. The Lord-Chancellor supported the bill, and pronounced the charge of an adulterous intercourse on the part of the Queen to be fully proved. Lord Erskine was proceeding to oppose the Bill, when he fell suddenly ill, and was carried nearly lifeless from the House. Lord Lauderdale, with great feeling, begged the House to suspend business for a quarter of an hour, in order that they might ascertain the extent of his noble friend's sudden and alarming indisposition. Business was suspended accordingly; but Lord E. getting no better, the discussion was resumed by Lord Lauderdale.

This is the last hour to which the London papers bring down the proceedings; but when the James Munroe was on point of sailing, it was reported in I pool, that the bill had passed the House that evening; and that the fact announced in a postscript to one of our London Evening papers.
