THE EMIGRANTS.

(From the Sheffield Iris.)

However easy it may be to demonstrate the expediency of emigration—and, under certain circumstances, nothing is more easy—it is, at all times, a painful spectacle to behold hundreds of our fellow creatures, as it were, casting their bread upon the waters, and trusting themselves to the ocean, in quest of that better fortune, which, if found at all, must be found after the lapse of many days. Men, no doubt, like vegetables, frequently thrive the better for being transplanted; but the preliminary process is always painful; and could we invest a tree with the "sensible warm motion" of animal life, it would not, perhaps, suffer more in being forcibly torn up by the roots, than a mind of sensibility suffers in being suddenly divorced from home, country, and friends—from the nearest kindnesses and tenderest sympathies of our common nature. No matter how slight a stake the poor emigrant may have had in that soil which now denies him the means of a comfortable subsistence; as he has but one father and mother, so he can have but one country: and the unbidden tear that steals down the manly cheek, proves that patriotism cannot be measured by the caprices of fortune, and the accidental distinctions of this life:

"There is a tear for all that die;
"A mourner o'er the humblest grave."

And in like manner, there is always some one to take an interest in the fortunes of the obscurest adventurer to a new continent; and when the emigrant thinks of the attentions of this one friend or relative—of his proffered convoy to the place of embarkation—of the warm grasp of his horny hand, or choked utterance of the word—"farewell," he feels that he is still an integer in the great sum of human existence, and eyes the receding shore with all the solicitude of Queen Mary herself, when about to exchange the latitudinary manners of a French, for the unbending strictness of a Scottish court, influenced as it then was by an individual whom she is said to have feared more than a regiment of armed men.

Impressed with these feelings and sentiments, I turned my horse's head, the other morning, in the direction of Glencaple Quay, and almost before I was aware found myself alongside of the good ship Elizabeth, then about to embark on a voyage of three thousand miles. The scene, to me at least, was extremely interesting. The lapse of a few hours had produced a wonderful change in the state of the weather—the equinoctial gales seemed at last to have expended their fury, and the uncommon mildness of the 4th of April was felt as not the less grateful that it was in some measure unexpected, and contrasted strongly with the angry winds and dashing rains by which it had been preceded. On one hand all was bustle and activity, while, on the other, the spectator found no lack of those parting scenes which according to Byron, "press the life from out young hearts." Here you had the light hearted sailor, skipping from sail to sail and shroud to shroud, with all the fearlessness of the squirrel tribe; and there numerous groups of poor emigrants, eyeing, with great anxiety, the flowing of the tide, and progress of those preparations, which seemed to hurry their departure, and caution them to abridge the tender interview. Among the females in particular, every eye was filled with tears, whether of those that went or those that staid—front the mother, whose affection was divided betwixt the infant at her breast and the children at her feet, to the unincumbered maiden who generously strove to assist her in her interesting duties. But amidst all the varieties of sex, character, and situation, exhibited in a mixed company of several hundred individuals, one little group, above every other forcibly arrested my attention. It consisted of five persons, namely, a man, his wife, and two children, together with an interesting youth, who had accompanied the latter to the beach, and evidently appeared in the character of her lover. A few broken sentences, which I accidentally overheard, at once initiated me into the secret of their history. The parties belonged to the class of small farmers, and the father being resolved to try his fortune in another hemisphere, his whole family had agreed to accompany him. In the expedition the stranger youth heartily regretted that he could not join; but still he determined to see the last of a family so dear to him; and while the old people began to ascend the vessel's side, he continued to grasp the hand of his sweetheart, with a fervour and earnestness which, under any other circumstances, would have excited the notice, and perhaps the ridicule, of the surrounding crowd.

But at this moment every one was too much occupied with his own cares to attend to the parting of these rustic lovers: and perhaps I was myself the only listener. While the faithful Thomas exclaimed, "O, Janie, Janie! if you kent but half o' what I feel at this moment, you would surely stay at hame, especially as your father has left it a' to yourself, and owned that he is loth to see us part. I hae na muckle, Janie; but you ken my fancy never glaiquet afeer anither; and as lang as these hands and this heart haud together, ye shall never want." "O Thomas!" replied Janie, "how can ye speak that way?—how can ye harrow up a heart that's owre grit already? My father, poor man, has met wi' mony a cross providence o' late; and how d'ye think I could sit in peace at hame, and my parents may be (here she cried bitterly) pining for want in a lan'
