JOHN JOHNSTON. P. DUMARESQ.

St. Peters, 23<sup>d</sup> Dec. 1820.

BOSTON, JAN. 2. 1821.

The most prominent intelligence contained in the papers, is the fate of the Bill of Pains and Penalties against the Queen, before the House of Lords. On the 9th November the question on ordering the bill to a second reading was taken, and carried by a majority of 28.—On the 10th, the question on the 3d reading, was carried only by a majority of 9.—Upon this state of things a Peer was about introducing a motion, when the Earl of Liverpool rose and gave notice, that in the nearly balanced state of opinion in the house, he and his associates in the ministry did not think it proper to prosecute the Bill any further, and he should therefore, instead of moving the question "that the Bill do now pass," move that it should be taken "that day six months." This intelligence was received with the liveliest cheers in the house, and is in fact a formal withdrawal of the Bill.

Lord Dacre offered a petition from the Queen to be heard by Counsel against the further passage of the Bill. Lord Liverpool said the application had become unnecessary. If the 3d reading of the bill had been carried by as large a majority as the second, the ministry would have persevered, and sent it to the other house. But in the present state of the country, and divided as the Lords were, he and his colleagues had determined not to proceed further with it.

He then moved that the question, "shall the Bill pass," be put that day six months. [Long and loud cheering.]

Earl Grey condemned the conduct of ministers in the strongest terms as to the measure the process and effects, and said the people would not be satisfied with the mere withdrawing of the measure, but would demand a strict inquiry into its foundation. Lord Erskine expressed his satisfaction at the result thus far, in earnest and pathetic terms. The Duke of Montrose opposed the motion. He was convinced of her Majesty's criminality, and should never look up to her as Queen. The motion was agreed to, and the Lords adjourned to Nov. 23, when the Commons meet.
