

POETRY.

THE GRAVE.

Under a flat turf let me lie
Where mid-day sun-beams never come;
Let a light brook go whispering by;
Near let the small birds build their home.

And round about and over head,
And every where, except the West,
Let a thin screen of leaves be spread,
As curtains to this couch of rest.

I'll have no weeping-willow there,
No yew to shed its church-yard gloom;
But blackthorn, with its blossoms fair,
And light birch, with its dancing plume:

Wood-bine, that loves on cottage eaves
To hang its flowers, and tendrils slim;
And holly, with gay glittering leaves,
And berries red, and branches trim.

And, looking-out from that dear spot,
Let none but sights of joy be seen;
The village spire; the peasant's cot,
With its small patch of garden-green;

Field flowers in blossom, sparkling rills,
And far-off trees of every hue;
The white flocks feeding on the hills;
And last of all the distance blue.

What!—in that best of earthly bowers
Must types of sorrow mock the dead?
Well—let one wild rose drop its flowers,
Or one small lily hang its head.

Oh, how I long for that lov'd home!
My eager spirit onward flies:
That heart luxuriates round the tomb
Whose hopes have left it for the skies.

AN EGYPTIAN TOMB.

Mr. Belzoni has finished his magnificent representation of the great monument which he first discovered in Egypt—the tomb, or more properly speaking, the sepulchral palace, of Psammetichus, the Egyptian King and conqueror. Preparatory to the opening of his exhibition to-morrow, Mr. Belzoni invited a number of his friends, amongst whom were many persons eminent for rank or literature, to a private view of it, on Friday last. We shall not attempt to describe this perfectly novel and most interesting scene. It is one of those which can be adequately understood and appreciated only after a personal examination.—We shall but remark, in general, that the two principle members of which the spectacle consists, are—a model of the entire tomb, on a reduced scale of one sixth of its actual magnitude, that is to say, the original being 309 feet in length, the model is 51 1-2; and, secondly, a fac simile of two of its most beautiful apartments, the dimensions of which were accurately measured, the human and other figures, and subordinate ornaments, taken off in waxen moulds and the colours copied in all their brilliancy on the spot.—Every eye, we think, must be gratified by this singular combination and skilful arrangement of objects so new, and in themselves so striking.—The vivid freshness of the tints, as rich and unchanged after three thousand years, as those of the finest draperies of Rubens—the symmetry, according to fixed, though erroneous principles, of the proportions—and, above all, the peculiar, and, we may add, beautiful expression and character of the national countenance which predominates throughout an assemblage of many hundred human forms—must affect the mind of the cultivated spectator with strange and mingled views respecting that unknown people of whose history, nay, of whose positive existence, the mansions of their dead are the melancholy but almost exclusive records. The mechanical ingenuity and indefatigable diligence by which Mr. Belzoni has been enabled thus to transport to European controversy the otherwise immovable excavations of Egypt, reflect no less credit upon him as an artist than his sagacity and success in discovering the subject matter of his extraordinary exhibition has distinguished him from all European travellers in modern times. A multitude of collateral curiosities—such as mummies, papyri, medals, and female ornaments—are placed in cases round the rooms, and are well worth public attention; the expense of the whole, we are given to understand, has been enormous.
