LONDON.
DISTRESS OF THE TIMES.

On this subject, so much has recently been said and written, that to multiply instances might seem superfluous, were it not that we have now lying before us, one, which whether viewed with reference to extent, importance, and we may add curiosity, is unquestionably without parallel in this or any other nation of the globe—and for the authenticity of the fact we pledge ourselves. To trace the ramifications of the distress—occasioned, as has been oracularly pronounced, by the alteration of our currency—were a task of great intricacy. For the pressure on the landed proprietor and agriculturist we can readily account; but that a leading daily print of the metropolis should participate in the pressure so generally felt, was not to be expected. Such however is the fact. We have now before us the Times of this day, in which abundant proof appears that this justly celebrated print has for many weeks been labouring under an accumulation of advertisements so heavy and so severe, that their office has long been besieged by individuals of all ranks and stations—an absolute epitome of society—all vainly imploring "speedy insertion."

This pressure of the "Times," so far from justifying Lord Londonderry's soothing assurance of abatement, was hourly increasing—nor did the relentless perseverance with which the Speaker daily took his seat in the Chapel of St. Stephen, give hope of relaxation, until Easter. In this emergency, one of these accidents, by which events the most unlooked for are sometimes brought about, has fortunately afforded the means of extrication from this embarrassment.

From what particular cause cannot be known—but so it was, that the number of members being insufficient to make a House, there was no debate. Like a skilful General, the Times, seizing the critical moment, at once relieved itself from the distress with which it had so long been pressed, by the insertion, in the number and a Supplement of this day, of eight hundred and seventy-two advertisements, the duty alone on which amounts to the unprecedented sum of £152 12s.; and it will be observed, for one day's publication only, independent of the stamps on which the paper is printed, amounting to upwards of £100! This alleviation of the "Distress of the Times" will, we trust, enable that able and important organ of the British press, to prosecute its labours with renovated vigour.

(FROM THE TIMES.)

We are this day obliged to present to the public a proof of the declining condition of the Times journal, in two whole sheets instead of one. It is not without considerable reluctance that we have encountered the expense and labour of this double publication, but we had no alternative. The pains which we have bestowed upon the Parliamentary debates, and the space which they have in consequence occupied, left no room for our advertisements. Our advertisements would leave no room for the debates. What, then, could we do but adopt the course which we have adopted? We confess we are proud
