GEORGE PEDOLIN.

Fredericton, 31st March, 1823.

On the Funeral of the late Lieutenant-Governor, Major-General GEORGE STRACEY SMYTH.

Fredericton, April 5th, 1823.

HARK!—a deep-answering groan to those sad rounds,
That speaks the anguish of New-Brunswick's wounds;

Whose solemn echoes tell each weeping shore,
Her great, belov'd Commander, is no more;
While the respectful, sacred tolling bell,
Slowly repeats farewell—a long farewell!
Oh Death!—relentless author of our woe
How dost thou joy to lay the mighty low!
Thou lov'st a lofty mark, we well may say,
Since the exalted SMYTH becomes thy prey.
Sad seat of government—prepare thy tears,
And smooth thy streets—the honor'd corpse appears
In solemn pomp—behold the sacred day—
The dark procession would obscure the way,
But for the scarlet, and the deadly white
Of scarves and cassocks, and the armour bright
That shed through sable weeds a dismal light,
By which the mournful march its way may find,
And sad musicians play should grief not blind.
Soft notes complain, touch all the chords of woe,
The soul of music's left your train below,
It breathes its sweetest tones to holy choirs,
Rapt in the ardour of immortal fires;
Pursue the sounds, then swell a bolden strain,
And the obedient, fearful feet unchain,
That faint would make an unrelenting stand,
Because the voice they lov'd cannot command.

But now, behold a more affecting scene,
Bare honor'd heads of wisdom move between,
On all around a thoughtful look they cast,
Their aged locks sigh with the whistling blast,
Then to the beck'ning earth submissive bend,
In silent grief lament the good man's friend,
The wise man's counsellor, the weak man's aid,
The tribute of their tears are justly paid,
By various ties to ev'ry rank allied,
The poor man's refuge and the rich man's pride,
Religion's safeguard, and true honour's boast—
All—all may mourn, for all a friend have lost.
Ambitious youths! ever revere his name,
Who kindled in your breasts a noble flame,
Not only bade your glowing souls aspire,
But kindly deign'd to fan the virtuous fire,
Still to enlighten and enrich the soul,
And with fair Science's sons your names enrol.

Ah! now with step majestic see they come,
And arm of black, with sadly muffled drum;
With sorrow's face, yet rais'd in martial pride,
On either side the stately ranks divide,
Struck to the earth—silent as death they stand,
As though his awful voice gave the command,
And o'er their mourning arms with reverence lean,
To hail the lustrous dead with warlike mein.
High waves the velvet and the streaming crape,
The cap and sword—what eye can now escape
The faithful horse—and oh! that look he wears,
Heavy his heart, tho' light the load he bears,
His drooping head and tardy steps declare,
The dress is all—alas! no master there.

Now all is hush'd!—the church her doors expand,

The Man of God leads forth the solemn band,
And moves in dignified and awful state,—
The Great I AM he seems to personate.
The resurrection and the life, he cries,
Shall bid Believers live, and joyful rise;
Methinks that rousing, soul-inspiring sound,
Might wake to joy the sable walls around.
The pensive organ's weeping face unveil,
That silent waits to tell a mournful tale,
The skilful hands she claim'd, now pale and cold,
With hallow'd warmth a glorious harp shall hold,
The voice now silent, then victorious sing,
O vanquish'd King of Terrors—where's thy sting?
Cheer'd by these hopes, again the moving train
Pursue their march with less regret and pain;
Religious awe now measures ev'ry sound,
While they the Temple of the Lord surround.

The sacred rites are o'er—Amen resounds,
Each to his station! Hark!—what warlike sounds,
Commanding voices, music's martial strains?
Our leader's low—honour his dear remains.
God save the King! We triumph in our woe,
Fire!—peals on peals—too much we can't bestow.
God save the King! Sure there is need to fear
When we behold death's noble ruins here.
Farewell—lamented SMYTH! lov'd master, friend,
Till the loud Trump of Heaven the vault shall rend.
No more we meet thy honor'd face—till then
A long farewell. God save the King!—Amen!
