 The night was spent in the utmost harmony and gladness, the Wines which were as good as the Province could afford were done ample Justice to—voluntary toasts, songs, and national airs from the Irish Bagpipe, gave zest to the joys of the table, and some found some of the chosen few still at their post, drinking a bumper to the hope that the next anniversary may bring back the blest hour of meeting again."

A Scholar of the Female Madras School's farewell to her Mistress.

*I'm young in years, my thoughts are weak and few,
 Nor is't ambition prompts, to see what I can do;
 But love I trust will guide my infant strain
 While this small Barque is wreck'd; upon the raging main*

Oh! and must I in secret mourn,
 To have you from my bosom torn,
 My friend, my mistress, and my stay,
 That led me in bright learning's way;
 That taught my young and foolish heart
 To act a wiser virtuous part.

O may the Lord remember you,
 Who did all here, that you could do
 To cultivate the stubborn ground,
 When little hope in it was found,
 The soil you plough'd, the seed was sown,
 And now we weep the "harvest home"

Why should I tell, the time's at hand,
 When you must leave your infant band
 To whoso fostering care . . . adieu,
 My soul with anguish parts from you:
 Let ev'ry varying thought of mind,
 Be on the weak you leave behind.

Farewell! my long lov'd preceptress,
 And may the Lord your strivings bless,
 That when you die, on hope reclin'd,
 You'll with your God a dwelling find;
 A dwelling far superior 't' this,
 Where ever reigns eternal bliss.
