AN UNWELCOME PARTNER AT CARDS.

(From the British Magazine)

In our regiment, whilst in the East Indies, were several wild young fellows, none more so than I; and as our life there was very monotonous, the officers betook themselves to gaming. One day, after dinner, cards were brought, and all of us entered with such energy into the fascinating game, that every thing else was in a manner neglected. At length we changed it, and betook ourselves in couples to separate games. I and Ensign A—, as gay and larkish a rascal as ever turned out from England, that we might pursue the game uninterrupted, ordered the servant to carry out into a sort of summer house, a decanter or two of wine, and the cards; and thither we soon followed. We played with intense eagerness for several hours, till it grew so dark that we could hardly see what was before us. I had been the gainer all the evening. "Come, A—," said I, addressing my companion, "I'm sure it's high time we should quit the cards and return, for we've a good deal of regimental business to do to night." "Stay, T—, and finish the game, you'll not move an inch till then." "I tell you, A—, I must and will be gone; why should we thus make a toil of pleasure, and besides gain another rebuke from the Colonel? I'll away." "Stay, and try one more game," said A—, laying his hand on my arm—"and I'll win back what I've lost!" "I may perhaps to-morrow, but now go I will." "Then," replied my companion, "if you do go, I'll stop and finish the game, if I have the devil for my partner!" "A merry game, and a pleasant companion to you; farewell!" said I, and left the room. I hastened to my own apartment, where I had a good deal of regimental business to transact. I had not been so engaged long, when the door was flung hastily open, and in rushed Ensign A—, his eyes starting with horror, and his cheeks as pale as marble. He sat down on a chair, looked fixedly on me, but without speaking a word. I called for wine, and got him to swallow a little. The cold perspiration burst from his forehead, and his eyes glared into every corner of the room, as though apprehensive that some wild beast was ready to spring upon him. "Why, A—," said I, snaking him, "what is the matter with you? Are you mad?" He made no answer, except by a faint murmuring kind of indistinct whisper. "Are you frightened—or what!" continued I, motioning to the servant to leave the room. By degrees my companion became composed. "Oh, T—," said he, faintly and slowly—"I am a lost man—a dead man!" "Pshaw, my good fellow, what is the matter with you? You've been too free with the wine; and that, added to your heated spirits, has nearly overturned your brain." "No, T—," he replied, "I am sober now, if I never was so before in my life. But my days on earth are numbered! Next Tuesday I shall be no longer an inhabitant of this world!" There was something so indescribably affecting, I may say shocking, in the deep deliberate tone of voice with which he uttered this, as well as the steady ashy hue of his countenance, that I sat down by his side without speaking. At length, taking his hand in mine, I asked him, in as soothing a manner as I was able, what had caused his terror. "Do you remember what I said, T—, on your leaving me to night?"—"Faith, yes; was it not that you would play if you had the devil for a partner?" "Yes," replied A—, with a sickening smile—"I did say so—and he took me at my word" he continued, gasping as if for breath. "Why—why—" stammered I, partaking of his fright—"Why, A—, you don't mean to say that—" "I mean to say simply this," replied my companion, with dreadful calmness, "that Satan has taken me at my word. A few moments after you had left me, I leaned my head on my hands, and shut my eyes. Immediately I heard a rustling among the cards on the table before me. I started, and— a convulsive shudder shook my frame, "there sat opposite to me, in the chair which you had just left vacant, a tall, pale man, dressed in black. Why—how in the—'s name did you come here?" said I, in amazement. "To finish the game with you, as you wished!" said the stranger, deliberately, at the same time arranging the cards; I saw that his hands were as white as alabaster; and he put the cards in order with amazing care and skill. He offered me a pack. "Why—who are you, and whence did you come?" stammered I, at the same time that my eyes seemed dancing in my head, and my knees smote together with agitation. "I am come to finish the game with you, at your own request," said the stranger, precisely in the same tone and manner as before. I would have answered, but my tongue clave to the roof of my mouth. "Why do not you take the cards?" said the stranger, in a hollow tone—"Will you finish the game according to your promise?" "N—o!" I contrived to
