Our port is now full of vessels and the beach swarms with emigrants. We should advise the latter to make all convenient speed to their several destinations. There is not a more general error among emigrants than the practice of loitering about town, and hiring themselves from day to day, to such as may employ them. In summer they may make a livelihood in this way, but whenever the navigation begins to close, and the throng of business to subside, they are left destitute. In the country it is different. There they will find employment all the year round, which although it should not put much money in their pockets, will at least procure them plenty of food and shelter, which is all that can reasonably be expected during the first winter. Besides, by remaining in towns, their case in another year is just as bad as when they landed. The supply of labour there is always equal to the demand; whereas, when they proceed to the less densely settled districts, they can procure land for very little, and may after a few years (of hard labour no doubt) place themselves in circumstances of comparative comfort.—New Montreal Gazette, May 26.

There is a report now in general circulation, and we ask the Canadian Spectator, as being in the confidence of the party, and probably in possession of a copy of the document, to set us right in this matter, if we should unwittingly err. It is said that the Delegates, anxious to have the opinion of Mr. Brougham, as a learned and experienced counsel upon some matters in this Province, such as the method of voting the supplies by the Assembly in contradistinction to that of by a civil list—the proceedings of the Assembly on the rejection of the Speaker—and a few other similar pretensions, paid that gentleman a very handsome fee, proportionate to his standing at the bar, the importance of the matters submitted to him, and the 80,000 freeholders for whom the opinion was desired. It is said that the opinion of Mr. Brougham was very short, directing our Legislators to peruse the "History of England" ere they pretended to advance such pretensions. If wrong in the statements, the Canadian Spectator can correct us.—Old Gazette.

MONTREAL, May 12.

Last Monday night, as the steam boat Chambly was passing the buoy at the outside of our harbour, a man about 25 years of age, a steerage passenger, ran suddenly across the quarter deck, plunged into the water and disappeared. At the cry of "a man overboard!" Captain Charles Armstrong, who was then on the engine House with the pilot, sprung down, jumped into the boat with one of his men, and with that promptitude which distinguishes him, (and which, by the bye, is one of the many advantages arising from a steam boat being commanded by a thorough bred sea captain) in a moment was in the midst of the strong current looking out for the fellow. At first he had good hopes of saving him, for, to his shouts, of "Don't be afraid, my good fellow! keep up!" he was answered, "I'm not afraid," but, as a dead silence soon ensued, he was afraid all was over. Keeping, however, in the agitated wake left by the boat, as the only chance of finding him, he had the good fortune to run right up against a figure upright in the water, and paddling to keep itself up, which proved to be the individual sought, who scrambled into the boat with surprising agility, considering the encumbrance of a heavy great coat thoroughly soaked. "What the devil made you jump overboard?" asked the captain,—no answer. When they came alongside, a lawyer from Three Rivers, (who had seen him jump overboard) exclaimed, "Why didn't you let the . . . sink, since he chose to jump over,"—no answer. In fine, the water had thoroughly cooled the suicidal resolve, and restored his discretion, and the convalescent allowed a generous Hibernian to induce him into a pair of grey pantaloons, and a fine linen shirt. Generosity, was, however, in this, as in most other cases, its own reward, for, the unworthy object of it decamped on his arrival at Quebec, "name unknown," and shirt and breeches unreturned.

HORRID DEED.—On Saturday a considerable sensation was excited in Lancaster, in consequence of a report prevailing that a woman had cut the throat of her child, and afterwards her own. It seems that the person alluded to, with her child, had been for some time residing at a house in China-lane, and the woman had been in the habit of attending a debtor in the Castle, and had passed for his wife, although her husband is still living. The woman's name is Sarah Parker, and the child's, a girl about 12 years of age, Amanda Parker, and daughter to the former, by her husband. Early on the morning in question, a little girl, daughter to the person with whom they lodged, was ordered by her mother to go into the room which the two persons occupied, and fetch a clean cap out of a drawer for her; but she came running down stairs screaming, saying that there was a red "boggart" in the room, and she durst not go in. Her mother then went up-stairs, and as soon as she reached the door of the room observed the wretched creatures lying on the bed, weltering in their blood. On examining them, it was discovered that the girl's throat was cut in three different places, and both hands shockingly mangled, in attempting to save herself; and her breasts were much scratched. The woman's throat was likewise cut, and an incision made in the wind pipe. A surgeon was immediately sent for, and the wounds had proper care taken of them. The woman resisted having her wounds dressed, and as soon as that on her throat was sewed up, she attempted to pull the stitches out again, but was prevented. On examining the room, a shoemaker's knife was found covered with blood, it having been taken from an adjoining room. The unfortunate girl has since communicated to the persons who attended her, that her mother inflicted the wounds on her throat whilst she was asleep, and that when she awoke, in consequence of the blood flowing into her throat, she was unable to speak or cry out. Her mother cut her own throat, and then went to the looking glass, and put the knife into the wound; that she struggled for some time with her, and succeeded in getting the knife from her, and put it in the place where it was found; that she then attempted to escape down stairs, but was stopped by her mother and dragged to bed. The wretched woman then laid down beside her daughter, and in that state they were found. The room door bore marks of bloody hands, which seemed as though the unfortunate child had reached that place, when stopped by its unnatural parent. The clothes they had on (night clothes,) and which were literally drenched in blood, are in the possession of the constable, as well as the knife. Had they not been found at the time they were, in all human probability death, very shortly, would have put an end to their earthly sufferings, as their wounds were bleeding profusely. The wretched woman appears to be a very ignorant person, and since this affair, has attempted to hunger herself, but on the doctor threatening to force meat on her stomach, she altered her resolution, and partook of food. No cause can be assigned as to the reason for committing the rash act. Reports says, that she formerly resided at Liverpool, and was an owner of hackney coaches at that place.—Manchester Mercury.
