There was a degree of bad taste, perhaps, in his allusions to the tame eagle, and in the spiteful emphasis with which he reminded the Commons that the lowborn Count de Morny was the brother of the Emperor; but it was not till in his subsequent reply to Lord Palmerston he hurled contempt at Napoleon le Petit, that the moral sense of the House was shocked, and the swelling murmurs almost drowned the honourable gentleman's voice. Lord Palmerston's reply was, I think, generally felt to be disfigured in a still higher degree with the fault of Mr. Roebuck ; that is to say, it descended into mere personal scolding. But these are reflections that come upon one afterwards -at the time there is nothing more interesting, nothing more piquant, than a personal altercation. It is amusing to watch how soon a quarrel absorbs the attention of those who were before most careless, how hushed the House gets, and

But it was on the discussion of the Conspiracy Bill itself on Monday night, that Mr. Roebuck most distinguished himself; his speech shone all the more that it was the only speech of the evening. It was near midnight when Mr. Roebuck rose, and his rising changed the aspect of the House. The listlessness and apathy gave way at once, and a ringing cheer that hailed his rising told how welcome was his appearance to an assembly oppressed with the leaden weight of dulness.
