Agriculture, &c.,

The Use of Clover.

It would be very difficult to over-estimate the importance of this crop to all farmers engaged in mixed husbandry.

Clover is valuable:

- 1. As a forage plant. 2. As a fertilizer.

The specific value of Clover, however, lies in its wonderful powers as a fertilizer. In this respect it is unequalled by any crop grown on the farm.

The following are a few selected from the mult of recommendations in our possession:

1st. Shading the surface of the soil. Owing to its rapid and luxuriant growth it soon forms a close and heavy covering over the soil, that acts as a mulch in protecting it from the scorching rays of the summer sun.

2nd. By aerifying and disintegrating the soil. Clover possesses peculiarly long and powerful tap-roots, that penetrate deep, loosening the soil and admitting the air.

3rd. By effecting important chemical changes, necessary to enrich the earth with plant food. Its abundance of foliage enables Clover to gather from the atmosphere immense stores of gasses that give life to the plants, which its far-reaching roots send deep down into the earth.

4th. By preventing washing. The Clover mulch breaks the force of the hard beating rains, while the roots hold the soil in a mat as it were, thus preventing from washing.

5th. As a green manure. Perhaps no crop is so valuable for turning under in a green stage, as Clover. In addition to the immense amount of rich vegetable matter in its abundant roots, the plant itself is extremely rich in all the materials necessary to the healthful growth of succeeding crops.

The London dairymen have decided that the most profitable cows are graded short horns, not because they give more milk, but because when past milking they make most beef.

A Parisian speculator sent a large number of carrier pigeons to Lisbon, to replace the telegraph, when all communication with Spain was interrupted.

An indignant orator at a lively political meeting, in relating an opponent, thundered: "Mr. Chairman, I scorn the allegation, and I defy the alligator."
