not careless wanderers, and he resolved to keep them in eight. They threaded a wood, and then, ascending a gentle eminence from which watch might be kept, reached and entered a meeting house. No sounds of psalmody were allowed to issue from it; but the voice of prayer, as he listened, went to the stranger's heart, and convinced him that he had found a home. Though he entered cautiously, the preacher was alarmed. He could not believe that a person of such unwonted aspect could be any other than an invader of their place. But a wave of the hand restored his confidence, and from the close of that service through many subsequent years Francis Turner, the learned and faithful preacher, found in Samuel Hall, the London merchant, a fast friend. It was not many years after that Sunday that another one, never to be forgetten, broke upon England. On the morning of the 4th November, 1868, the fleet which bore the Prince of Orange slackened sail and held divine worship under the cliffs of the Isle of Wight. Next morning the prince landed quietly, and not as the painters represent, on what was then a desolate rock on the western point of the great amphitheatre of Torbay. If in the course of a summer journey you should ever fasten your eye upon the inscription which it now bears, and summon up all the powers of your imagination, you would scarcely be able to realise the sentiment of fear and hope which throbbed through the island when it heard of that landing. It was impossible for the Government to carry out its own views of religious liberty against the powerful parties opposed to it. It was still denied to the Romanist and the Unitarian to meet for worship; and no one unless he took the sacrament in the established church, could hold any office under the Crown, represent a constituency in Parliament, or direct the affairs of a corporate town. But the change was vast when brought into comparison with the past, and one among greater results was that the church at Hill-Cliffe began to send its preachers to Liverpool, which, though since increased in population a hundred times, presented even then a large field of labour. Mr. Turner generally performed the journey on foot, though a horse was sometimes provided for him. It was many years later before one could drive a carriage nearer to Liverpool than Warrington. A cordial reception was given to these messengers of peace. We are assembled this evening on a spot which then formed the ample garden of a mansion standing on one of the most picturesque spots of the suburban villiage of Everton. It belonged to a " good physician," named Daniel Bean or, as he was styled according to the fashion of learned men adopting the Latin translation of their names, Daniel Fabious. Little is now known of this "Gaius" of our early church. It may be perceived by the tablet over his grave, on your right hand as you enter, that he died at the early age of thirty-seven; but not before his house, which had been registered according to the Act of Toleration, in the last year of the seventeenth century, had been exchanged by his further liberality for a small wooden chapel, surrounded in course of time by the dust of those who were denied an honourable burial in the national church yards. When the congregation left this cradle in Everton, and erected a building known in recent years as St, Stephen's, Byrom street, now at last demolished, it passed into a period of great depression. The half century, which followed the opening of that edifice was, religiously one of the dreariest in English history. The pressure of persecution and the fury of political parties being allayed, a condition followed difficult to pronounce either death or life. Large numbers parted from evangelical truth altogether, and those who retained their hold of it seemed half ashamed of the possession. "The Puritans," some one has well said. " were dead and the Methodists were not born." The blessing, however, for which the few had not ceased to cry, arrived at last. Like the breath of spring, the Divine Spirit came noiselessly but mightily over the whole church. There was probably not a spot in the land in which the gospel had been planted which did not partake of the mysterious influence. John Newton, the vicar of Olney, at that time resident in Liverpool, tells in his inimitable letters how he was cheered in the first days of his religious life by intercourse with the minister and members of that little church, disclosing in his charming style the piety which, in that cold age, glowed in the families and meetings to which he was made welcome.

This healthful tendency was immensely accelerated by the appointment of a minister of good education and considerable original genius, who had come under the influence of Whitfield during a short pastorate in one of the southern counties. This was Samuel Medley, who, during the last quarter of the century, appears to have been a marked religious power not only among his own flock but in the general population. The breadth and energy of his ministry emboldened the people to make great aggressions on the world, and prepare them for the reception of the approaching missionary spirit. For the five years preceding Medley's decease Carey had been preaching beside the waters of the Ganges, and sending through England a new thrill of zeal. For generations the chief effort of Christians had been directed to the preservation of their own faith; they now caught sight of the law which makes their well-being dependent on the interest in the well being of others. The era then ushered in is that in which it | liberal supplies they have granted. The is our happiness to live, and I have now time only to breathe the prayer that all the evangelical churches, of whatever form or name, in this great town and especially those representing the people from the web of whose history I have just drawn out a single thread, may act with fidelity to their responsibilities, and with full trust in Ilim who has been and will ever be the the dwelling place of his church.

The congregation then sang the bymn "O God of Bethel, by whose hand thy people still are led," and the service was closed with prayer.

THE GREAT ROWING MATCH. RENFORTH DEAD .- Many of our readers have doubtless heard the result of the great rowing. Speeches were made and resolutions adopted Match at St. John, on Wednesday last. The Tyne Crew had come out from England to contest a race with the St. John men-the Paris Crew. The race commenced at 7 o'clock in the morning in the presence, it is said, of 25000 persons. They had gone but a short distance-about three quarters of a mile-when the stroke oars-man Renforth the leader of the crew fell down and was smitten with death. It was at first supposed that it arose from some foul-play, but on the boat making for the shore, medical aid arrived and it was pronounced a death-stroke; and he was a corpse in less than an hour. The St. John Crew passed over the course, a distance of six miles, in 39 minutes and 20 second, leaving it undecided which would have been the winner if Renforth had lived.

A Coronor's Inquest was held and evidence taken from several of those who had been associated with deceased. A post mortem examination was held and the death was believed to have been occasioned by pulmonary apoplexy or congestion of the lungs. The Jury have adjourned to meet again on the 4th of September, to receive the report of the medical men. They will suspend their verdict until that date.

We have often wondered whether there is a person in all New England who doesnot know and appreciate the value of "Johnson's Anodyne Liniment" as a family medicine? It is adapted to most all purposes, and is the best pain killer that can be used.

Farmers and stock raisers have frequently told us that they have seen very good results from giving "Sheridan's Cavalry Condition Powders to cows and swine before add after they drop their young. The Powders put them in good condition, and give them strength to care and provide for the sucklings.

GRAHAM'S PAIN ERADICATOR supplies a want long felt by all, whether on sea or land, of having some sale and effectual remedy. All are subject to accidents and sudden attacks of disease, for which they should be prepared, as sickness comes when not expected, and the timely use of a suitable remedy will often prevent a great deal of sickness, suffering pain, and expense. To those living where Medical aid cannot be readily obtained, a good Family Medicine is indispensible, and a full supply should constantly be kept on hand.
