

the statue, which was at once done, amid the strains of the National Anthem, performed by the Promenade Band.

The Dean of WESTMINSTER, on being asked to address the assembly, said:—The Mayor has done his work on this day, the Duke of Bedford has done his work, the sculptor and the artist have done theirs, and now I ask you to do your work in commemorating John Bunyan, and that is—every one of you who has not read the Pilgrim's Progress, if there be any such present, read it without any delay, (hear, hear); those who have read the Pilgrim's Progress a hundred times read it again for the hundred and first time, and then follow out in your lives the lesson which the Pilgrim's Progress teaches you; and then you will all of you be better monuments of John Bunyan even than this magnificent statue which the Duke of Bedford has given to you.

A public meeting was held in the Corn Exchange in the afternoon, and was attended by upwards of 1500 persons. The Dean of Westminster delivered an Address, from which the following passages are taken:—

"Most fitting has it been that the first statue that has been erected to the memory of the most illustrious citizen of Bedford should be the offering of the noble head of the illustrious house to which Bedford has given its chief title. Most fitting is it that St. Peter's-green of Bedford should in this way—if I may borrow an expression I myself have elsewhere employed—have been thus annexed to the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abby. (Cheers.) To claim the one effigy that England possesses of the first of human allegorists, to claim him, citizens of Bedford and Bedfordshire, is your glory. (Cheers.) It is the strength of a county or of a town to have its famous men held in everlasting remembrance. They are links by which you are bound to the history of your country, and by which the whole essence of a great nation is bound together. In your Bedfordshire lanes he may have found the original of his Slough of Despond. In the hills and gardens of West and Haynes and Woburn he caught the first glimpses of his House Beautiful; in the turbid waters of your Ouse, at flood-time, he saw the likeness of the river Very Deep, which had to be crossed before reaching the Eternal City. You have become immortal through him; take care his glory never fades away from you. (Cheers.) And here this local connexion passes into an ecclesiastical association, on which I will dwell. If Elstow was the natural birthplace of John Bunyan he himself would have named as his spiritual birthplace, the meeting-house of Bedford and the stream of the Ouse at the corner of Duck Mill-lane, where in middle life he was re-baptized. There, and in the dells and fields where he went about disguised in a smock-frock and with a carter's whip, he became the most famous preacher of the religious communion which claims him as its own. The Baptist, or Anabaptist Church, which once struck terror and dismay by its very name throughout the States of Europe, now, and even in Bunyan's time, subsiding into a quiet, loyal, and peaceful community, has numbered on its roll many illustrious names—a Havelock among its soldiers (cheers), a Carey and a Marshman among its missionaries (hear, hear), a Robert Hall among its preachers. (Cheers.) I speak now only of the dead; but neither among the dead or the living who have adorned the Baptist name is there any before whom all other Churches bow their heads so reverently as he who in this place derived his chief spiritual inspirations from their teaching. Among their titles to a high place in English Christendom the nurture of John Bunyan is their chief and sufficient guarantee. We ministers and members of the National Church have much, we think, whereof to glory. We boast, and think we justly boast, that one of our claims on the gratitude and affection of the country is that our institutions, our liturgy, our version of the Bible have sustained and enlarged the general culture even of those who dissent from much that we teach and much that we hold dear; but we know that even this boast is not ours exclusively. You all remember—the Mayor has reminded you of it—Lord Macaulay's saying that the 17th century produced in England two men only of original genius. These two were both Nonconformists—one was John Milton, the other was John Bunyan. (Cheers.) I will venture to add to Lord Macaulay's remark this one—that the whole of English literature has produced only two prose works of universal popularity, and both of these also were by Nonconformists. One is the work of a Prebyterian journalist, and it is called Robinson Crusoe; the other is the work of a Baptist preacher, and its name is the Pilgrim's Progress. (Cheers.) Every time we open its well-worn pages or look upon that venerable face they remind us Churchmen that Nonconformists have their own splendid literature; they remind you Nonconformists that literature and culture are channels of grace no less spiritual than sacraments or doctrines of the Church. (Prolonged applause.)

And now, having thus rendered honour to whom honour is due,—honour to the town of Bedford and honour to my Nonconformist brethren—let me take that somewhat wide view to which I have said this occasion specially invites me; only let me, before entering upon that survey, touch for a moment upon the contrast which is presented by the recollections of which I have just been speaking and the occasion which brings us together. There are certain places which we pass by in our wanderings in life like to which Pilgrim saw, in which two giants dwelt of old, who, he says, were either dead many a year ago or grown so crazy and stiff in their joints that they did little more than sit in their caves, their mouths grinning at the pilgrims as they go by. It is such a cave's mouth as we are in to-day. We see at a distance—a long distance of 200 years—a giant who in Bunyan's time was very stout and hearty. What shall we call him? His name was Old Intolerance—a giant who, first under the Commonwealth in the shape of the Presbyterian clergy, could not bear with the preaching of an illiterate tinker and unordained minister, and then in the shape of the Episcopal clergy, shut him up for 12 years in Bedford gaol. All this is dead and gone for ever. (Immense cheering, and a voice, "Bravo!") Don't be too jubilant. The old giant is still alive. He may be seen in many shapes on all sides, and in many voices. The spirit of burning and the spirit of judgment have not altogether departed from mankind, either from Churchmen or Nonconformists (hear); but his joints are very stiff and crazy, and when, on this day, clergy and magistrates of Bedford are seen rejoicing in common with their dissenting brethren at the inauguration of a memorial to him who once suffered at the hands of all their spiritual forefathers, it is a proof that the world has, at least in this respect, become a little more charitable, become a little more enlightened, and more capable of seeing the inward good behind outward differences. An excellent and laborious Nonconformist, who has devoted long years to the illustration of the genius of Bunyan, describes with just indignation the persecuting law of Charles II. under which John Bunyan was imprisoned, and adds:—

"This is now the law of the land we live in." No, my good Nonconformist brother, thank God, it is not now, nor has it for many a long year been in force among us. In the very year in which John Bunyan died came the revolution, to which, when compared with the numerous revolutions which swept over other countries, may be well accorded the good old name of "glorious," and one of its most glorious fruits was the Toleration Act, by which such cruelties and follies as the Conventicle Act of Charles II. became henceforth and for ever impossible. (Cheers.) We had still much to learn in this respect, but we had learnt something, and this day is another pledge of the victory of Christian faith, another nail in the coffin of our ancient enemy. If it was Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, who closed upon him, it was Witchel, the Quaker, who opened for him the doors of Bedford Gaol."

Addresses were also delivered by Earl Cowper, and the Rev. Drs. Brock and Allon.
