A RITUALISTIC FUNERAL. - The Guardian finds in an exchange the following account of a ritualistic funeral, which took place in Norwich Cemetery: "First there was a boy carrying a large brazen cross, and on each side of him a boy bearing a lighted candle. Then followed seven boys and that we ask is a fair trial and if it does not do five men; then a man swinging the incense; then came the clergyman (Rev. E. A. Hilyard), and after him another man; than a coffin covered with a violet pall (having a large cross in the centre, and otherwise decorated), carried by six men, on each side of whom were three young women. All the men and boys were clad in long black-gowns, over which were white surplices reaching just below the waist. The young women were dressed in white, and wore black sashes and long white veils, each carrying a bunch of flowers. Mr. Hilyard was enrobed in a large cloak made of black and white material, on the back of which was a device representing a crown of thorns and some nails, and on his head was a hat MESSRS. CALES GATES & Co. of curious pattern. The certege being thus formed, they started for the grave, which was situated at some short distance."
