On the 25th inst., of diphtheria, Emma Augusta, aged 10 years, daughter of T. R. Black, Esq. It is not often that the tear falls more freely, on the demise of a child, than at the funeral of little Emma Black. Hers was knowledge and amiability far beyond children of her years. Her sweet disposition made her not only the pet of her own household, but of the whole neighborhood. Although but ten years old, she shewed by her life that she loved the Saviour; that she was not too young to walk with God. One of her expressions is worthy to be noticed: "I can talk to Jesus just as easy as to papa!" Every morning on joining the family standing by her mother's chair, she repeated a passage of Scripture committed before she had left her room; and at Sunday School recited the whole of the verses with others learned for the occasion. This is but one of many instances which manifested her uniform goodness. She seemed like a monitor to the other children, setting them an example in everything. For months past she cherished a desire to unite with the church, and was waiting only till her father had sufficiently recovered from a recent illness to join herself with those who had professed like precious faith. But, alas for earthly hopes! The flower bloomed, but to fade. Diptheria came, and Death fol-
