Quadrilles Now Being Revived

British Favor It But Said To Be Much Too Complicated For Most Dancers.

London.—Quadrilles are returning to the ballroom.

Following the quadrille sets at the state ball at Buckingham Palace the dance has been placed on the programs at a number of charity dances in the west end.

Dance academies are experiencing a demand for lessons. "I expect quadrilles to be a fashion at society dances, but I do not think the fashion is likely to extend to dance halls," said a dancing teacher.

"One reason is that square dances are not very popular at that type of place.

"Another is that the modern generation has grown so used to simple, go-as-you-please dancing that quadrilles will be far too difficult and complicated for the majority to grapple with."

Engineer's Whistle To Shriek Warning Now 100 Years Old

German Reveals British Made First "Tooter" After Farmer Lost Eggs.

Berlin.—Among neglected centenarians of this year is that of the locomotive whistle.

A German writer, Franz Ferdinand, has drawn attention to the fact that a steam whistle was first manufactured by the firm of Taylor and Co. in Warrington (England) in 1835, thus displacing the use of the steam trumpet, a Newcastle-on-Tyne invention which had been put into operation on the Leister-Swannington Railway.

Earlier still the locomotive driver was obliged to use a post horn like any old time coachman. It was in 1832 that a farmer, driving his cart laden with eggs for the market, crossed the Leister-Swannington track but disregarded the warning toot-toot from an approaching locomotive. The farmer was lucky to escape with his life to tell the tale of his woe and ire, for the rear part of the cart was caught by the locomotive, which made scrambled eggs of his whole consignment along the rails. Hence a move was made for introducing a more audible warning on the railroads and steam trumpet and steam whistle were tried out in turn.
