Double Anniversary

With their usual ingenuity and Scotch thrift those two madcaps, GEORGE BURNS and GRACIE ALLEN, contrive to celebrate a double anniversary this February with their adopted daughter, SANDRA, as guest of honor. Gracie figures Sandra will be one and one-half years old and it is her own fourth anniversary on the air with George Burns—so they compromised on a one-pound birthday cake. George and Gracie are heard over the WABC-Columbia chain every Wednesday at 9.30 p.m., A.S.T.

Vacuum Bulbs Are Now Turned Out By New Machine

Human Skill Far Outstripped by Glass Blower Making 500 a Minute.

Nature is one down in a test in Wellsboro, N.Y., of the scientific principle that it is better to improve on her than to imitate her.

The example is a glass-blowing machine making nearly 500 bulbs a minute—electric light, radio or other vacuum bulbs.

It is the result of an attempt started by the Corning Glass Works to build a bulb-making machine to imitate workmen. Originally such a machine was made, which like the human blower, dipped its glass from a molten pot. The mechanized imitator worked, but it was cumbersome and intricate. So the glass research scientists discarded the idea of imitating human skill.

They devised a spigot, out of which white-hot glass pours in a never-ending stream. The glass runs out at the about the speed and consistency of pancake batter upon a hot skillet.

The stream of glass passes through a wringer which flattens it out to about the thickness of pats of restaurant butter. These pats drop upon small, flat-iron plates, which have holes in the centre, says The New York Times.

The plates are on an endless belt. As they speed away from the molten spout, each in turn is capped by a blowgun, which settles down on top of the glass pat and blows the molten material down through the hole. The glass extrudes through the hole like a thin, hollow, white-hot sausage skin.

Metal molds, travelling the same speed as the endless belt, then rise from below to encircle the molten glass sausages. The molds are the shape of the bulb desired. The interlining of the molds is a porous substance soaked with water. The heat of the glass turns this water into steam, so that the molds never really touch the glass. A thin layer of steam is the real mold.

Against this perfectly shaped steam cushion the blowgun above forces the now cooling bulb to its final contours. The mold whirls so that the steam not only shapes but polishes the bulb.

Then the mold drops away and the machine does something a workman never would do. It strikes the now hard bulb with a hammer. The blow breaks the bulb away from the endless belt and drops it, a finished product, upon a moving canvas belt.

RAINING WINE

Hundreds of gallons of wine recently rained on the French town of Dinan. Inhabitants, when they noticed that the rain was red, collected it and sent it to laboratories for analysis. It was found to have a high alcoholic content and to taste like wine. Scientists stated that the phenomenon was due to the wind carrying small fruit which was crushed in the air. The sugar then fermented.

IN EXPLANATION

Her lips were so near
That—what else could I do
You'll be angry I fear.
But her lips were so near—
Well, I can't make it clear,
Or explain it to you.
But—her lips were so near
That—what else could I do?
