informed of the progress of the allied armies after quitting their position on the Alma, and are supplied with the particulars of the grand strategic movement by which the port and heights of Balaklava were secured as a basis of operations against Sebastopol. Having left the field of their victory on the 23d ultimo, the allied armies crossed the Katscha, and on the following day passed the Belbek. It had been arranged that the siege material should be landed from the transports at the mouth of this stream for the attack of Sebastopol on the north; but our commanders now discovered that the enemy had thrown up fortified works which would prevent the approach and entrance of the ships. Lord Raglan and Marshal St Arnaud at once resolved on a course which must strike the least skilled in military manoeuvres as equally rewarkable for the sagacity and prompti-tude wits conception, and the energy and

The army was under the necessity of literally steering its way through the forest southsouth-east "by compass," the wood being so thick as almost to prevent the men from recognising each other, and causing the different regiments to mingle together indiscrimately, "Highlanders and Gnards, Guards and line." Amidst the confusion the discharge of cannor was heard in the direction in which the troop, were proceeding. After tearing their way through six miles of jungle, our troops now reached the high road leading to Balaklava, and proceeded, without encountering further difficulty, through the plain traversed by the Tchernaya river, upon the banks of which they bivouacked that night, after having been under arms for fourteen hours. Next morning, the 26th, they pressed on for Balaklava. Halting at the entrance of the pass, a detachment of rifles was sent in advance to crown the heights surroun ding the bay. The old Genoese fort presently opened fire, and Lord Raglan made a narraw escape from a shell, which wounded one of his staff. The guns of the eastle were soon silenced, the small garrison capitul and the British troops took possession town and harbour. They were pro joined by the fleet, which had come from the mouth of the Katscha. Lieut. Maxse, of the Agamemnon, a young British officer, file missing had volunteered, when the army was on the Belbek, to return alone through the country crossed by the troops, and request Sir E.

He reached the fleet at 4 o'clock on the mor- ed. ning of the 26th, and the squadron was off Balaklava, with the siege train, tents, and baggage, before noon on the same day. The military authorities appear to be highly satisfied with the strength and security of Balaklava as a basis of operations a-gainst Sebastopol. Lord Raglan mentions that he had obtained a good view of the place on the 27th, and ordered the two divisions of the army which had not been engaged on the Alma, to take up a position in its immediate vicinity. The engineers landed at that place. Active operations against the fortress were to be commenced without delay.

The Times thus alludes to the effect of the isolated position of the Russians.
