

THE SIGHTING OF SEBASTOPOL.

Gen. Colington, hearing the signal of the assault on the Malakoff, after a short pause, gave the order to storm the Redan.

The French parties of the 3d and 97th dashed out, and, favoured by tolerably even ground, passed the abatis, which was no terrible obstacle to their progress, and planted their ladders on the salient angle of the work.

The French attack on the Little Redan and works upon the Carcening Bay were failures for other reasons. The troops moved resolutely on, rapidly crossing a broad space which lay between them and the Russian redoubts.

They were thrown into considerable confusion by rows of holes called trous a coup, into which the men tumbled in the darkness caused by dust and smoke. Their attack was deprived of this of its firmness, and was repulsed by the enemy.

At eight o'clock last night the Russians began to withdraw from the town, in the principal houses of which they had previously stored up combustibles, in order to render Sebastopol a second Moscow.

At two o'clock this morning the fleet had been scuttled and sunk, with the exception of steamers. About 12,300 men of the Second Division on duty in the trenches observed a preternatural silence in the Redan, and some volunteers crept up into it.

About two o'clock, flames were observed to break out in different parts of the town. They spread gradually all over the principal buildings. At four o'clock a stupendous explosion behind the Redan shook the camp; it was followed by four other explosions equally startling.

The contest on which the eyes of Europe have been turned so long is nearly decided—the event on which the hopes of so many mighty empires depended is all but determined. Sebastopol is in flames! The fleet, the object of so much diplomatic controversy, and so many blood-stained struggles, has disappeared in the deep!

and irregular elevations, and in many instances above each other. The ground was strewn with them so as to be completely invisible. To add to the horrors of the moment, the shells from the Redan and steamers fell in numbers upon the portion of the work in possession of the French.

RETREAT OF THE RUSSIANS.

At eight o'clock last night the Russians began to withdraw from the town, in the principal houses of which they had previously stored up combustibles, in order to render Sebastopol a second Moscow.

At two o'clock this morning the fleet had been scuttled and sunk, with the exception of steamers. About 12,300 men of the Second Division on duty in the trenches observed a preternatural silence in the Redan, and some volunteers crept up into it.

About two o'clock, flames were observed to break out in different parts of the town. They spread gradually all over the principal buildings. At four o'clock a stupendous explosion behind the Redan shook the camp; it was followed by four other explosions equally startling.

The contest on which the eyes of Europe have been turned so long is nearly decided—the event on which the hopes of so many mighty empires depended is all but determined. Sebastopol is in flames! The fleet, the object of so much diplomatic controversy, and so many blood-stained struggles, has disappeared in the deep!

The contest on which the eyes of Europe have been turned so long is nearly decided—the event on which the hopes of so many mighty empires depended is all but determined. Sebastopol is in flames! The fleet, the object of so much diplomatic controversy, and so many blood-stained struggles, has disappeared in the deep!

At this time there were several regiments in the 4th, 5th, and 6th parallels, which did not move sufficiently quick, and were not in time to save the relics of the stormers; the Redan was thus won and lost.

that she has not yet lost Sebastopol. The allied fleet remains outside, paralysed by Fort Constantine and its dependencies, and every one is going about asking, "What are we to do now?"

The town is still burning and in ruins. It is in possession of the French. The following order has been issued on the subject: "Five officers and several men injured by explosions today."

The same master hand gives us the following glimpse into the Russian Hospitals in Sebastopol:

Descending from the Malakoff we come upon a suburb of ruined houses open to the sea; it is filled with dead. The Russians have crept away into holes and corners in every house, to die like poisoned rats; artillery horses, with their entrails torn open by shot, are stretched all over the space at the back of the Malakoff, marking the place where the Russians moved up their last column to retake it under the cover of a heavy field battery.

The hospital of Sebastopol presents the most horrible, heart-rending, and revolting. It cannot be described, and the imagination of a Fieschi could not conceive anything all like unto it. How the poor human body can be mutilated and yet hold its soul within, when every limb is shattered and every vein and artery is pouring out the life stream, one might study here at every step, and at the same time wonder how the little will kill!

Of all the pictures of the horrors of war which have ever been presented to the world, the hospital of Sebastopol presents the most horrible, heart-rending, and revolting. It cannot be described, and the imagination of a Fieschi could not conceive anything all like unto it.

At this time there were several regiments in the 4th, 5th, and 6th parallels, which did not move sufficiently quick, and were not in time to save the relics of the stormers; the Redan was thus won and lost.
