The truth is, that when every thing has been said that can be said to the disparagement of this Emperor, his is a character and career thoroughly, and indeed singularly, appreciable by the British people. In no country is decision of character, singleness of aim, fixedness of purpose and useful ambition, more in honour. We hold up to our children the instances of those who have raised themselves from a humble position, or forced their way through great difficulties and discouragements. We point with pride to cellors, and the son of a country parson the great Lord Nelson. Even in the career of Wellington, we chose to forget that he was born and bred in a Court, with unbounded born and bred in a Court, with unbounded congage the forts.

The Herald's correspondent's letter to the circumstance that an Emperor, and, still more, an Emperos, is seldom seen in England; to the prominent position which these personages have occupied in the talk of the day for several years. Yet there remains the question what it is that has so wonderfully moved our curiosity in this instance 2—why how we, a constitutional people, flock in crowds to do a species of homage to one who has raised himself above constitutions and laws; and the way are we ready to deff the hat, to bow the head, to wave the handkerchief, or, at all events, assist with our presence, the triumphant progress of a self-raised absolute sovereign, the sole source of law, the single type of porty millions of our nearest neighbours, once our enemies and now our allies?

Question, indeed, there is actually none, for, as we have obscured, us one is surprised.
