LIKE NO OTHER LOVE.

CHAPTER I.

"Let me see him," he whispered. In a few moments the nurse brought in a lovely, imperious-looking child, between two and three years of age, his face full of rich coloring, with laughing eyes and smiling lips, bonny white shoulders and arms, and fine sturdy limbs. He uttered a cry of delight when his mother raised him in her arms; and the two formed so beautiful a picture, that it was no wonder the dying man was loath to leave them.

Sir Antony opened his arms with a low cry that his wife never forgot. "Come here, little Carlos! Ah, Carlos," he said, tenderly, holding the child to his breast, "my little darling, my baby-son, I am going away—going to the good Creator who made me! Carlos, will you be good? Will you promise me always to do what mamma says?"

"Always to do what mamma says," lisped the child, with great, wondering eyes. Sir Antony took a diamond ring from his finger and laid it in the soft, rosy palm of the boy's hand.

"Mamma will tell you all about it when I am gone. When you are old enough, you must wear that ring as a pledge of your promise to me; and your promise is 'always to do what mamma says.'"

"Do not go away, papa," said the boy with quivering lips.

"I must, Carlos." Sir Antony took his wife's trembling hands and placed them within the warm rosy hands of the boy.

"My wife and my child," he said, in a weak voice, "I leave you in the keeping of the angels. I pray that you may both come to me; you will if—" Then the feeble hold relaxed.

Lady Carew hastily rang the bell, and the boy was carried from the room crying out that papa must not—should not—go.

The sun set, and the golden light died from the walls. The song of the birds grew fainter; on the breeze was borne the murmur of the water-fall and in the solemn hush of evening Sir Antony's spirit winged its flight, and his wife lay weeping in hopeless sorrow on the breast of the dead man.

The Carews of Firholme had been a very numerous and martial race, men of magnificent physique and of strong passions. But of late years there had been fewer Carews, and for four generations an only son had succeeded his father. What Sir Antony had said was true—self-will was the curse of the Carews. They never brooked opposition or contradiction, and could not endure to be thwarted. This characteristic had led many of them to sorrow and death; and, as a rule, it was because they had ignored the advice of friends and gone their own way.

Sir Antony had been one of the most amiable of his race; in him the obstinacy that distinguished the Carews, had been tempered by great amiability and by his passionate love for his wife. He was very young when he succeeded to Firholme; and he married the beautiful Mildred Chester, the indulged and beloved child of a wealthy old country squire.

Sir Antony and his lovely child-wife had lived happily enough. During the first year of their married life he took her to London for the season, where her beauty and grace created quite a sensation. But Lady Mildred did not care much for fashionable life. She loved her husband with the utmost devotion; she loved their grand old home where he ruled in lordly fashion; and, when the little heir was born, she begged her husband to remain at Firholme.

Sir Antony was delighted at the birth of his son and heir, and took a pleasure in watching his pretty babyways. He foresaw already the germ of some noble qualities in the child.

"We must begin at once with him, Mildred," he would say, "if we want to make a man of him. Let us teach him self-control—no man is worthy of the name if he has none."

He formed many plans for the education of his son. He had read and pondered the annals of his family, and it seemed to him that it was his mission to begin a new order of things. But grim Death came on him unawares. He bought a fine thorough-bred, rode it in spite of the warnings he received, and he was brought home to die.

Loved by all, one of the most popular men in the county, and one of the happiest in the world, in a few short hours, by his own rash act, a sudden termination came to all his happiness, and he was laid at rest in the vault where the Carews for many generations had slept. And then the beautiful young widow, still almost a child in years, was left mistress of Firholme and guardian of her son.

CHAPTER II.

Sir Antony had made his will, and a handsome income was secured to Lady Carew. He expressed his wish that she should live at Firholme with his son Sir Carlos until he became of age; then she could please herself. The rest of the money was to accumulate until the young heir attained his majority. The advice of the rector, who had been Sir Antony's best friend, was also to be taken with respect to Sir Carlos's education, and he was to be consulted in any difficulty that arose.

So, after they had laid Sir Antony to rest, Lady Carew's life began once more. She intended to be a careful mother; she ended by idolizing her boy. She meant most faithfully to carry out the wishes of her beloved husband; yet the time came when she could refuse nothing that her son asked her.

He was a beautiful child, with dark curly hair, a lovely face full of rich coloring sturdy limbs, and a princely bearing, of which Lady Mildred was most proud. He had unlimited sway over the whole household. The head-nurse, Mrs. Parker, was a stately dame, thoroughly accustomed to the charge of children, but quite unable to run about—a disadvantage of which young Sir Carlos availed himself as soon as he could run alone. Mary Hanson, the under-nurse, a pretty intelligent girl of eighteen, was envied by everyone in the house, because her sole occupation was so attend to the young heir.

Many and anxious were the consultations between the widow and the rector.

"I am sure," she said piteously one day, "that it would be useless to engage anyone to teach him yet. I can do it. There is nothing I should like so much as teaching Carlos to read and write—he is so clever."

CHEESE-MAKING IN P. E. I.

From the Department of Agriculture it is learned that the progress of cheese-making in Prince Edward Island under the system conducted by the Dairy Commissioner is this year exceeding expectation. The output during the present month of June, for export, will equal, and very probably exceed, the whole of the export for the year 1893, the second year after the commencement of operations. The progress may be stated as follows:—In 1892, output for export, 700 boxes of cheese; in 1893, 6000 boxes; in 1894, 11,000 boxes; and in 1895 the output will be 20,000 boxes; the output during the present month being 6,000 boxes. This is a very satisfactory statement. The reports from Nova Scotia are nearly equally favorable.

For a family medicine, Ayer's Sugar coated Pills are unrivaled. They eradicate disease.

FREDERICTON SCHOOLS.

FREDERICTON, June 20.—The public closing exercises of the city schools yesterday were of the usual character. There was a good attendance.

Sixteen candidates were graduated from the High School, and received graduating certificates.

Miss Ethel Brittain was awarded the Douglas silver medal for proficiency in classics.

Miss Fannie Hoben won the mathematic prize, and in the competition in English Lizzie Dougherty, Ethel Brittain and Fannie Hoben were so close that a prize was given to each.
