THE BRITISH ELECTIONS.

No more interesting spectacle is presented in the world at the present moment than the field in which the electioneering contest is being fought that is to decide the composition of the next House of Commons. The fact that the first batch of returns is to hand, showing that 54 Conservatives and Unionists, four Liberals, and three Parnellites have been elected without opposition, indicates no more than that the battle has begun in earnest. That it will be a stubbornly contested one there seems every probability. Although there has been a prevailing impression, since the defeat and resignation of the Rosebery Government, that the Unionists would have but little difficulty in getting themselves returned by an adequate if not an overwhelming majority, there is nothing in the aspect of events to contravene the assertion that only the most determined work on their part will assure that end. The farewell honors bestowed by the outgoing Ministry have been followed by the coincidence of a plentiful replenishing of the Radical treasure-chest. The sinews of war, which it was complained were lacking, have suddenly developed in quantity and vigor. The assailants of the integrity of the Empire may have to put up unknown and untried men, but they will be backed up by the valuable support of money. If the Unionists neglect to use every precaution against defeat they may find when the returns of the next ten days come in that some seats which they counted as their own have been snatched from them by the desperate efforts of their opponents.

These considerations give to the struggle those characteristics of arduous uncertainty which the true Briton loves in any contest, whether in the sporting or the political field. There is in this case no foregone conclusion, but a great nation body. is going to determine whether it will have revolution or the gradually broadening down "from precedent to precedent" which has hitherto found favor. The opinions of the revolutionary party have been put forward in a manifesto by the never forget. I just bubbled with joy. I National Reform Union. The two most wanted to hug everybody and tell them my own self had died yesterday and my important planka may be said to be Home Rule all round, beginning with Ireland, find it this way?" and the abolition of the legislative power of the House of Lords. There is probably a good deal of floating electoral opinion in England that will be solidified into determined apposition at the poils to those determined opposition at the polls to those tw) aims. During the past nine years Englishmen have had every opportunity of making up their minds to be once more master of the situation. It would not be surprising if they determined, after long forbearance, that the interests, of the Empire are not best conserved by wrangling over such unproductive questions. Moreover, the inexpediency of having a government in office with only a weak and precarious majority has been burnt into the consciousness of the nation. This may ead some to support the new Ministry who would not otherwise be brought

HENRY HOLLAND. OF THE LAHAVE BANKER MARITIME, DRANK CARBOLIC ACID FOR PARAGORIC AND DIED IN 15 MINUTES.

HAWKESBURY, C. B., July 14.—The La-Have banker Maritime arrived in port today from the North Bay with 550 quintals codfish, bound home, with the remains of Henry Holland, who died on Thursday. The deceased went to the medicine chest about 11 a. m. Thursday for some paragoric, but made a serious mistake, as he took a dose of carbolic acid instead. He expired about fifteen minutes after making the fatal mistake. He was a sober and industrious young man, who leaves a wife and three children to mourn his loss. He was about 32 years of age.
