The young lady, too, was visibly affected.

A shriek, a cry, she stood amazed, Then sank spell-bound and upward gazed,

Then fell on the floor like a lump of lead

And everyone thought she was dead.

Her mother quickly ran to the house of a neighbor for restoratives and a messenger was dispatched post haste for the family doctor, who came in time, bringing along with him a friend from a city near by, a dentist, and as the case was urgent they made all possible speed in the direction of the Whiskers mansion, but on making too short a turn in at the gate the buggy collided with a hydrant and the horse breaking away from all encumbrances started on a 2.40 clip in the direction of the baseball ground on the summit of the hill, rejoicing in his new-found freedom, and leaving the worthy disciples of Hippocrates and Aesculapias sitting comfortably in the seat, and for all I know they may be sitting there yet. The young lady was soon brought round and a new patch has been dove-tailed into the leg of the young man's pants, while the flesh is slowly healing and the hole made by the dog's teeth slowly filling up. The dog has been relegated to the back yard and fastened, like the malefactor he is, with a ball and chain, and things are beginning to assume their usual course.

Two men stopped in front of Oak Hall window in St. John during the visit, recently, of "Prof." Lawrence, hypnotist. "Hello!" observed one, "where is the cataleptic subject that was here yesterday?" "O," replied his friend, "they sold him to the Blank Railroad. Their sleepers, you know, are not sound enough!" K. C. T.

WHISKERS' DOG.

An Amusing Tale of a Factory Town, in Which Lovers, Dog and Doctors Mingie Indiscriminately.

A gay young Lothario from Brick Hill, who is a frequent visitor at the Whisker's mansion in Mud Lane, attracted thither, so rumor says, by the charms of their beautiful and accomplished daughter, was strolling past the place toward evening and must needs stop for a conversation with his fiancée, who was sitting with her head out of an upper window, no doubt awaiting his approach. The couple indulged in the small-talk and tittle-tattle common to lovers, for some time, and were enjoying themselves immensely in their way. Suddenly a commotion was heard which broke up the seance and dissipated the hopes and plans of the lovers as the simoom destroys the countryside or the fell tornado carries death and desolation in its path. Whiskers is the possessor of a dog—a big whitey-brown animal about the size of a lime cask, with big savage, blood-shot eyes, and fangs like a Damascus blade. This fact we did not mention earlier in our story because we were reluctant to disturb the sweet serenity of plighted bliss by introducing such an incongruous element as a dog, but he forced himself upon us, or rather the young man, making his presence felt in no unmistakable manner beneath the leg of his pantaloons about one foot down on the side from the conjunction of the legs with the body.

A yell, a whoop, he jumped and swore, Then down the hill he madly tore, "And he never came back."
