

There's Another Dollar Due You at the Mill.

While seated in the post office looking o'er my mail
 Reflecting on the prospects of the Poor House or the Jail,
 As the season's work was finished and I'd nothing more to do,
 And the prospects for the winter I confess were rather blue;
 A friendly tap aroused me and I turned and looked around
 And the company's clerk with smiling face in front of me I found,
 Who quickly volunteered the news that they'd made a mistake,
 And then without a sledge hammer the news to me did break :—
 "Why this sad dejected mien, 'tis the worst that I have seen,
 Stop your weird prognostications and pre-sage of coming ill,
 Cease this sighing and complaining 'stead of losing you are gaining
 There's another dollar due you at the mill.
 Then my spirits quickly rose, and the blood that had been froze
 Leaped throughout my veins tumultuously, my heart began to thrill
 Surely I am not forsaken and I yet may "save my bacon"
 With this other dollar due me from the mill.
 Of course I must not spend it, or that would quickly end it
 And my prospects for the future as the present would be nil,
 And through trouble and privation this shall be my sole salvation,
 This other dollar due me at the mill.
 O, that other dollar due me from the mill, With it my empty coffers I will fill
 And my larder up with food and my cellar up with wood,
 That other dollar due me from the mill.
 O, that other dollar due me from the mill It robs the wintry wind of half its chill
 And throughout the winter drear this thought my heart will cheer
 There's another dollar due me at the mill.
