"I never saw such a girl as Clarie ." exclaimed Mrs. Templeton Freswicke, with an air of one who has lost all patience. "For my part, I'm in no hurry to dispose of her," said Mr. Templeton Treswicke, leaning back lazily in his cushioned chair. "She is the sweetest child in the world, and a great comfort to me. Besides, she is young yet-"

"Young!" echoed his better half, in a tone of such maj stic scorn that he was glad to relapse into silence. 'She is eighteen years o'd, as you are well aware. Her sisters had more self-possession at fifteen. It seems impossible to break her of that fooling habit of blundering and doing everything wrong, and looking so terribly frightened when any one speaks to her.'

Mr. Treswicke might have told his wife that her way of speaking to Clarie, when reprimanding her, was enough to frighten anybody who was not thoroughly hardened: bus Mr. Treswicke knew from bitter experience, that it was the better part of prudence to hold his tongue.

Mrs. Treswicke was much disturbed about her youngest daughter, and often declared she was the oddest girl in existence. Annabella was a very charming young ady, who took to waltzing and the German as naturally as if she had been born to them; Gertrude slipped gracefully into a musical and literary grove, which was an excellent card to play; but poor little Clarie seemed to fit nowhere. She was shy and silent in the ball-room, struck unaccountably mute when she ought to be talkative, and seemed to prefer the woods, or a lone spot by the shore. when all the world flocked to the ballroom of the Ocean House, or the United States.

Mrs. Treswicke's sole object in coming down here to this fashionable wateringplace, to pass the dog-days in grand style face and laughing eyes of Mr. Chesney among her dear five hundred friends, was to bring Clarie out. And Clarie was disappointing her sorely. The girl was entirely to timid to have her wits about her, and her mother always made the matter a thousand times worse by fixing those
