She could not well have been prettier but she might have been happier. The Vanes were comparatively rich and Miss Florence their only daughter. She was petted and loved by all who knew her, not for her beauty alone, but for her sweet disposition, her true nobleness of soul, and those approved feminine qualities that render maidenhood so irresistibly charming. But her whole vouth was in danger of being crushed and blighted by that dark cloud looming on the horizon of her happiness.

sheeny, silver-gray dress she wore.

She loved Doctor Edward Castlemaine, the young physician who came from the city a year ago and set up an office in the village near her father's home. She loved him with all the strength of her clinging affectionate nature, and in the halovon days gone by he had given her more reasons than one to believe that the pas sion was mutual. But now-now the dream was beginning to fade; the future was losing its visionary bloom.

Her cousin, Miss Veronica Vane, had come down from the city to pay her a visit. This visit, being originally intended to last two weeks, had lengthened into two months, and was likely to continue through a third. Miss Veronica meeting Doctor Castlemaine, had recognized an old acquaintance of school-day memorytheir first meeting she proceeded to monopolize his society. This left Florence much to herself, and as you may imagine her thoughts were anything but agreeable. She could not help noting the progress of the flirtation; it was impossible not to see that her lover was being daily lured further and further away from her. and the horrible thought that he was playing her false at last forced itself upon her It did not occur to her that her cousin

Veronica was the only culpable one in the affair. She thought Doctor Castlemaine was attracted by the beauty and brilliance of the queenly brunette, and so gave himself up entirely to his new infatuation. She was thinking of this to day as she strolled among the gorgeous flowers, and her heart gave a sudden jump when the voice of her cousin fell upon her ear. "All alone, Floy? Why, what a taste for solitude you seem to have acquired lately !" Tall and gloriously beautiful she came along the walk, attired in a black silk dress, with velvet sleeves and trimming. the elegant train held gracefully in one kidded hand. There was grace in her every movement-even in the way she held her parasol.

"I am not alone," said Florence calmly. " At least, I never feel as if I were alone when I am with my flowers." Veronica laughed.

"That is a very pretty idea," she said-"very romantic, and all that-but I am afraid you would find flowers but dull company if you were allowed to have no other. But I didn't hunt you up to talk nonsense. I've got a letter, and I want to show it to you." She drew it from her pocket as she spoke. "It is from Doctor Castlemaine; his office-boy brought it. just as I returned from the village." " Doctor Castlemaine lives close enough

he chose," observed Florence, quietly. "He explains why he decided to put this one on paper," laughed the brunette "But you shall read it, little coz, and see if you don't agree with me that your handsome doctor is a precious fool. Florence retreated a step. She had no desire to read the letter, and said as much

"Oh, but I want you to," coaxed Veronica. "You can't sympathize with me until you know something of the unpleasant position in which I am placed. It is so provoking! I am sure I never intended to flirt. Do read this, Floy, and tell me what to do."

hand to push away the proffered note. But Veronica, slipping her arm around the girl's waist, and holding the open sheet before her eyes, read aloud the hastily written lines:

" MISS VANE : - There is no need to tell you what your feminine perception has already discovered—that I love you! I to observe that her cousin was strangely felt satisfied at one time that I had nothing to fear in putting my fate to the touch; but what am I to understand from certain occasions? I have scarcely had an opportunity to speak with you alone; you know how I am situated with your cousin; but this uncertainty has gown intolerable, and I must know whether there is hope for me or not. That will show me that my fondest hopes are realized. If I do not see the flower in your hair, I will know that I have hoped in vain, and will never trouble you again. "EDWARD CASTLEMAINE."

White and cold and still, Florence stood there like an image carved in marble while the words of that note seemed to swim before her eyes in characters of fire. At the conclusion she heard herself laugh and make some jesting remark, and the voice was so unlike her own that she did not recognize it. Then she heard her cousin saying:

In spite of her own suffering, she pitied him from the depth of her aching heart, for she understood that he had looked in vain for the rose among the jewels that adorned Veronica's hair, and was trying CABINET MAKER very hard to bear the shock bravely.

But she was filled with surprise a few minutes later to see him dancing with her cousin. He still looked pale and troubled, but Veronica was talking and laughing as merrily as if she were innocent of causing him the slightest pain. "How can she be so cruel?" thought Florence; and then resolutely turned her attention to the entertainment of

In the course of the evening her friend, May Dutton, came to her and said:

"Floy, dear, do you know how lovely you are this evening? But you haven't to be the bearer of his own messages, if quite color enough. Let me fasten this red rose in your hair-it will heighten the effect wonderfully."

The necessity of appearing unchanged was such a strain upon her nerves that she now determined to seek a few moments of solitude. Slipping through one rows of Chinese lanterns suspended from the cornice.
