Saved: A Fireman's Story.
'Welcome, George, welcome!' and the beautiful, smiling Mary Merton drew her lover from the hall into the richly-furnished parlor. 'But why so dilatory? You promised to be here an hour ago.'

...bush, and for some time it smoldered away, completely filling the cellar with the stifling smoke. At last however, the fire reached a dry wooden partition; and as if by magic, the flames burst forth with all their devouring force, and in a few minutes the entire cellar was enveloped in the angry element. It was not long ere it reached the kitchen above, where now material awaited its virulent approach, augmenting its fury, till finally both cellar and kitchen had succumbed to its devastation. Still the two inmates slept soundly above.
CHAPTER II.
It was near the hour of midnight. The heavy clouds festooned their frowning masses across the dark ether heavens, and the myriad of silver stars that would have smiled upon a silvery world, were excluded from sight, rendering all nature black and dismal.
Suddenly a dark form passes quickly up the street. Reaching the engine-house of the 'Hand-in-Hand' company, he produced his key, with which he raises the lock, and in an instant the doors are thrown wide open. Next, he dons his hat and belt, and grasps a torch, which he lights at the dimly-burning gas. All this is the work of but a moment. Then he seizes the bell-rope, and instantly the brass peals burst forth from the lofty belfry, like the loud wailings of some lost spirit, and echo far and wide over the slumbering city.
Soon the apparatus is sent thundering through the streets, in the direction of the conflagration.
'Where's the fire boys?' asks George Raymond, as he grasps the rope.
'Down at old Judge Merton's!' answers the one with the house-horn.
'Great heavens!' muttered George to himself; and then recalling the event of the previous evening he continued, 'I knew they didn't put it all out; it has been burning ever since!'
As they neared the scene some homeless urchin caught the rope; but in an instant the director shouted through his horn—
'Get off there, you little rascal—do you want to be run over?' and the youthful vagrant fled no more.
The citizens were gathering from all directions, and as yet no other company had appeared. Their first act was to procure a plug.
'Here's one,' shouted the director, and the carriage was instantly backed up for an attachment.
But it proved to be only an ash-barrel, which had been mistaken in the dark shadow of an overhanging maple, and its incense contents were flying in all directions.
'Get that plug around the corner—wake up now, for here comes the "Union" crew of George Raymond, and his brave heart beat rapidly as he saw the flames and smoke belch forth from the grand old windows of the Merton mansion.
He thought of Mary—where could she be? Perhaps her beautiful figure was already a charred mass in the bowels of the fire; or she might yet be struggling on life's verge, vainly seeking for some means of egress by which to escape the torturing ordeal around her. Suspense of this nature was agonizing to Raymond. A fireman had just succeeded in saving a female, but it proved to be the hose of the 'Hand-in-Hand' attached, and the first stream went up, like a jet of crystal, into the midst of the torked flames. The other companies were soon on the ground and a host of well directed streams were sent into all parts of the burning building.
Not a moment was George Raymond at rest. All the while he was on the go, endeavoring to learn something in regard to Mary. Suddenly he heard a startling cry, and looking up at one of the upper windows, he saw there, amid the clouds of smoke, the slender form of Mary Merton! With outstretched arms the terrified girl was viewing the din and confusion in the street below, and imploring assistance from the army of noble hearts that hurried to and fro beneath her window. Her piteous entreaties were heard by more than one, and they instantly adopted measures for her rescue.
'A woman! cried several. 'Great God! don't let her be burned to death!'
A ladder was hastily raised, and a dozen stout men advanced their willingness to ascend, but the excited Raymond was before them.
'Stop!' he exclaimed, 'let me go first! And grasping the ladder he ascended with the agility of a squirrel.
But the frantic girl did not see his approach, and with one long, despairing cry she threw up her arms and sank back into the suffocating smoke and heat.
'O heaven! she cried, as he quickened his steps and finally reached the window. Without pausing he leaped into the burning room, and with her name upon his lips, he stepped forward. Now the confusion and excitement increased, and several streams of water were thrown up into the chamber. Another ladder was put up against the wall, and several firemen commenced ascending; but just at that moment Raymond re-appeared at the window with the insensible girl in his arms. He was the personification of excitement, and his clothes had caught fire; but instantly the water was showered upon him from below, extinguishing the flames.
'What noble being saved me from those terrible flames?'
'A fireman!' replied George, smiling.
'Was it you?'
'Yes.'
'O George, how can I repay you for this?'
'Think not of that Mary; I did no more than my duty. But do not fret me with more commendation than you gave them last evening.'
'A deal more,' she replied, coloring; 'and hereafter I shall speak of them in the highest terms—of you, especially, for what you have done this night; accept a thousand thanks for such a noble act; I shall never forget it. Had I listened with more attention to your last words, when you left our house three hours ago all this temptation would have been prevented. But where is Bridget?'
'Safe,' said Raymond.
It was not long ere the Merton mansion was rebuilt and refitted, and it looked even more handsome than before. All traces of the fire were effectually obliterated, and with the additional costly improvements it looked more like a new building than one that had been repaired.
Mary Merton now answers to the name of Mrs. George Raymond, and she and her worthy husband reside with the 'old folks,' who often give sympathetic support to George and his fire-company, and never is there a merrier time than when every member of the 'Hand-in-Hand' is present at the Merton mansion.
