Well, sir, am far more desirous for peace at the present moment than I was then. First of all, there is not the smallest pretext for war, and then if there is war not the remotest chance exists of its leading to any result. I am, as you know, one of the authors of the Treaty of San Stefano, and my constant pre-occupation and 1875 the capital of the country was inin drawing up that document was scrupu 000, or about twelve thousand millions of cott's side, occasionally prompt her father to lously to avoid everything that might affect the interests of Great Britain or of Austria. The River Rion drift sands to such an extent that all our efforts remained fruitless. The mountains that mark the new frontier in Armenia are impracticable during the greater portion of the year, which guarantees us against incursions from the Kurds and other uncivilized tribes, while our neighbors are safe from all surprises on our part. We have been no less lenient in the question concerning the Straits. They form the passage leading to our house(le corridor de norte mairon), and we, surely had some right to see that it was kept clear. The Dardanelles must remain open. If England were to establish herself permanently there, we should have to secure the Bosphorus, England having a fleet, whereas we have only a few ships. But there is no reason why England should not take one of the islands outside, such as Mitylene for instance, if she thinks proper to do so. As to the difficulty that has ariser between St. Petersburg and London respecting the Treaty of Peace being submitted to Congress, I myself attribute it to a mere while they work. Perhaps that is an impormisunderstanding of words. We might have kept the Treaty back till the Congress met. and thus have given the Powers no time for preliminary examination. We proved our other stands up to it. Why is it that we do
