Never, in the fairest days of Grecian loveliness, was there one more graceful or elegant than this Sciote girl form was of exquisite proportions; her feet and hands were delicately small: and her face was modeled in the purest style of classic beauty. A broad, low forehead; large, languishing eyes; straight and exquisitely-chise ed nose: mouth small almost to deformity; and chin gracefully rounded, formed the details of her courtenance. Her tresses were long, luxuriant, and dark as the wing of night. She wore a jacket of crimson silk, fitting tight to her beautiful bust. and fastened in front by diamond buttons. The two upper buttons, however, were now loosed, disclosing the fine cambric cymar beneath, that, white as it was, scarcely rivaled the snow skin. By that time, too, the war will be over, and we can reside here security, which now we cannot.'

He spoke earnestly and eloquently, and the maiden wavered for a moment, But it was only for a moment. However strong her love, duty was stronger, and she answered sadly, yet firmly.

"It cannot be. I will never wed another, but I must not wed even you without my father's consent. Oh! remember the curse pronounced against those who disobey their parents.'
