A single slip or a false step sends him to a horrible death. Statistics gathered as long ago as in 1852 showed that the proportion of men killed in this vocation on certain roads was greater than that of soldiers killed in ordinary warefare and if railroad officers would give as much care to the protection of these men as they do the safety of passengers and freight, two thirds of the accidents that now occur might be avoided. As one means of prevention the cars should be brought closer together Another was by providing an iron upright guard around which a man might throw his arm while applying the brake, so that in case of the breaking of the chain, or slipping of the wheel, he could have something to hold on to.
