Notes and Suggestions of Practical Utility

Gleanings of Interest for Our Country Readers.

Save the best for seed. Handle bees with gloves. Teach colts no bad tricks. Do not let a tree overbear. Don't mow lawns too close. Cut weeds before they seed. Don't neglect the aftermath. Punctuality is a prime virtue. Reduce the cost of production. Store in summer for winter use. A fish with sunken eyes is stale. A fast man is apt to be slow pay. Hens are not grown for the crop. Cut grass early and not too close. Guesswork wins only by accident. The clover root is a good subsoiler. All men want others to be honest. Provide the home with shade trees. Embden geese are good for feathers. There is nothing gained by fretting. Much is lost by lack of promptness. Never "break" an animal; educate it. A good reputation is better than gold. Eternal vigilance is the price of fruit, Who opposes the general purpose hog? It is better to grow feed than to buy it. The lighter the gate the less it will sag. Build sheds for shade if you haven't trees. Moral cowardice is a poor crop to cultivate. If you like shade provide it for your stock. Oats and peas make good pastures for pigs. THE POULTRY YARD.

Arrangements for Poultry. While the animals on a farm have suitable arrangements in buildings and pastures, and and are carefully looked after until the stable and barn doors are fastened for the night, the poultry are in many cases expected to find their own quarters and perform for themselves a part of the necessary work required in their management. To be compelled to hunt for nests, or have the hens laying in the stable troughs, is an indication that someand also that he has not provided all the conveniences for the hens to which they are entitled, as producers on the farm of a salable article.

When hens are kept for the purpose of laying a large number of eggs, and fail to perform what is expected of them, there is a liability that some mistake has been made in their management, and that they are not forty-five miles au hour. kept under those conditions which assist them in complying with the desires of their owner. are allowed to go beyond their bounds, they are then obstacles and nuisances instead of being beneficial. When a flock is kept for profit it should be properly supplied with all that it demands, if it is possible to do so. The arrangements of the grounds and quarters are to be considered first, not only because the fowls will receive a benefit, but because by so doing the work will be done more systematically and carefully.

does not deserve careful supervision by the farmer, with every effort made to arrange for the best results; but when any one branch is to be slighted it is the poultry. Yet on every farm the largest profit, in proportion to capital and labor bestowed, is made from poultry, a careful keeping of accounts demonstrating such fact in every case. Profits have been derived on some farms that were undeserving, the hens receiving no consideration compared with the care bestowed on other stock.

Avoid Shipping Fowls Alive. Those who have never seen fowls arrive their destination, when sent to market July and August, while the weather is excessively warm, would be surprised could they witness the birds when they reach the merchant. In a large majority of cases quite a number of birds will be dead in the coop, and the others unfit for sale. The loss of fowls and the low prices obtained will not compensate the shipper, unless he lives near his mar ket. Dressed fowls bring the highest prices, It often pays to water the roots of shade and arrive in good condition when properly packed and sent by express.

The broken china and crockery, pounded and scattered where the hens can pick it up, will be eagerly accepted, and as it is better than gravel, being much sharper and more serviceable, i will not be out of place to save such articles and use them as grit for the fowls.

Scabby Legs.

Scabby legs are disgusting, and the sun mer season is favorable to their appearance. It can be prevented by greasing the legs of the fowls about once a month with melted lard. To remove it, mix one part crude petroleum with four parts lard, and apply the mixture on the shanks once a week three or four times, and the difficulty will be removed.
