The question of color of butter came up for discussion at one of the New York institutes. The reply of president Gilbert was: "When we have customers who want colored butter we measure both cream and butter before mixing. I have some customers who will no take artificially colored butter, and who, in winter, cause me some trouble, as I have to make separate churnings for them." He did not know of any breed of cows that would give the same color to butter in winter that that they do in June. But, he said, I have seen a few individual cows that would come close to it; and I have also seen individual cows that would color their butter too much in June. There are cows in all breeds that color their butter at all seasons, more or less and there are those in the same breeds that insist on white as the best of all colors, per-Your Dollars haps because "white" is a symbol of innocence.
